Accept, Sir, the respectful acknowledgments of the Senate of the United States for your Speech delivered to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the present session.

While we devoutly join you in offering our thanks to Almighty God, for the return of health to our cities, and for the general prosperity of the country, we cannot refrain from lamenting that the arts and calumnies of factious, designing men have excited open rebellion a second time in Pennsylvania; and thereby compelled the employment of military force to aid the civil authority in the execution of the laws. We rejoice that your vigilance, energy, and well-timed exertions, have crushed so daring an opposition, and prevented the spreading of such treasonable combinations. The promptitude and zeal displayed by the troops called to suppress this insurrection deserve our highest commendation and praise, and afford a pleasing proof of the spirit and alacrity with which our fellow-citizens are ready to maintain the authority of our excellent Government.

Knowing, as we do, that the United States are sincerely anxious for a fair and liberal execution of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, entered into with Great Britain, we learn, with regret, that the progress of adjustment has been interrupted, by a difference of opinion among the commissioners. We hope, however, that the justice, the moderation, and the obvious interests of both parties, will lead to satisfactory explanations, and that the business will then go forward to an amicable close of all differences and demands between the two countries. We are fully persuaded that the Legislature of the United States will cheerfully enable you to realize your assurances of performing, on our part, all engagements under our treaties, with punctuality, and the most scrupulous good faith.

When we reflect upon the uncertainty of the result of the late mission to France, and upon the uncommon nature, extent, and aspect, of the war now raging in Europe—which affects materially our relations with the Powers at war, and which has changed the condition of their colonies in our neighborhood—we are of opinion, with you, that it would be neither wise nor safe to relax our measures of defence, or to lessen any of our preparations to repel aggression.

Our inquiries and attention shall be carefully directed to the various other important subjects which you have recommended to our consideration; and from our experience of your past administration, we anticipate, with the highest confidence, your strenuous co-operation in all measures which have a tendency to promote and extend our national interests and happiness.

SAMUEL LIVERMORE,

Mr. Ross notified the Senate that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to revive certain suits and process in the Circuit Court for the district of Pennsylvania, which have been discontinued.

TUESDAY, December 10.

Agreeably to the resolution of yesterday, the Senate waited on the President of the United States, and the President of the Senate, in their name, presented the Address then agreed to.

To which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES made the following reply:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I thank you for this Address. I wish you all possible success and satisfaction in your deliberations on the means which have a tendency to promote and extend our national interests and happiness; and I assure you that, in all your measures directed to those great objects, you may, at all times, rely with the highest confidence on my cordial co-operation.

The praise of the Senate, so judiciously conferred on the promptitude and zeal of the troops, called to suppress the insurrection, as it falls from so high authority, must make a deep impression, both as a terror to the disobedient, and an encouragement of such as do well.

TIMOTHY BLOODWORTH, from the State of North Carolina, and JOHN E. HOWARD, from the State of Maryland, severally attended.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee appointed for the purpose on the 18th inst., reported the draught of an Address to the President of the United States, on the death of General GEORGE WASHINGTON; which being read in paragraphs, was adopted, as follows:

To the President of the United States:

The Senate of the United States respectfully take leave, sir, to express to you their deep regret for the loss their country sustains in the death of General GEORGE WASHINGTON.

This event, so distressing to all our fellow-citizens, must be peculiarly heavy to you, who have long been associated with him in deeds of patriotism. Permit us, sir, to mingle our tears with yours; on this occasion it is manly to weep. To lose such a man, at such a crisis, is no common calamity to the world. Our country mourns her Father. The Almighty Disposer of human events has taken from us our greatest benefactor and ornament. It becomes us to submit with reverence to him who "maketh darkness his pavilion."

With patriotic pride, we review the life of our WASHINGTON, and compare him with those of other countries, who have been pre-eminent in fame. Ancient and modern names are diminished before him. Greatness and guilt have too often been allied; but his fame is whiter than it is brilliant. The destroyers of nations stood abashed at the majesty of his virtue. It reproved the intemperance of their ambition, and darkened the splendor of victory. The scene is closed, and we are no longer anxious lest misfortune should sully his glory; he has travelled on to the end of his journey and carried with him an increasing weight of honor: he has deposited it safely, where misfortune cannot tarnish it, where malice cannot blast it. Favored of heaven, he departed without exhibiting the weakness of humanity. Magnanimous in death, the darkness of the grave could not obscure his brightness.

Such was the man whom we deplore. Thanks to God! his glory is consummated; WASHINGTON yet lives—on earth in his spotless example—his spirit is in heaven.

Let his countrymen consecrate the memory of the heroic General, the patriotic Statesman, and the virtuous Sage; let them teach their children never to forget that the fruit of his labors and his example are their inheritance.

SAMUEL LIVERMORE,

President of the Senate, pro tempore.

Ordered, That the committee who prepared the Address wait on the President of the United States, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that it should be presented.

Mr. DEXTER reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States and that he had acquainted them that he would receive the Address of the Senate immediately, at his own house.

Whereupon, the Senate waited on the President of the United States, and the President of the Senate, in their name, presented the Address this day agreed to.

To which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES made the following reply:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I receive with the most respectful and affectionate sentiments, in this impressive address, the obliging expressions of your regard for the loss our country has sustained in the death of her most esteemed, beloved, and admired citizen.

In the multitude of my thoughts and recollections on this melancholy event, you will permit me only to say, that I have seen him in the days of adversity, in some of the scenes of his deepest distress and most trying perplexities; I have also attended him in his highest elevation, and most prosperous felicity, with uniform admiration of his wisdom, moderation, and constancy.

Among all our original associates in that memorable League of the Continent in 1774, which first expressed the sovereign will of a free nation in America, he was the only one remaining in the General Government. Although, with a constitution more enfeebled than his, at an age when he thought it necessary to prepare for retirement, I feel myself alone, bereaved of my last brother, yet I derive a strong consolation from the unanimous disposition which appears, in all ages and classes, to mingle their sorrow with mine, on this common calamity to the world.

The life of our WASHINGTON cannot suffer by a comparison with those of other countries who have been most celebrated and exalted by fame. The attributes and decorations of royalty could have only served to eclipse the majesty of those virtues which made him, from being a modest citizen, a more resplendent luminary. Misfortune, had he lived, could hereafter have sullied his glory only with those superficial minds, who, believing that characters and actions are marked by success alone, rarely deserve to enjoy it. Malice could never blast his honor, and envy made him a singular exception to her universal rule. For himself he had lived enough to life, and to glory. For his fellow-citizens, if their prayers could have been answered, he would have been immortal. For me his departure is at a most unfortunate moment. Trusting, however, in the wise and righteous dominion of Providence over the passions of men, and the results of their councils and actions, as well as over their lives, nothing remains for me but humble resignation.

His example is now complete, and it will teach wisdom and virtue to magistrates, citizens, and men, not only in the present age, but in future generations, as long as our history shall be read. If a Trajan found a Pliny, a Marcus Aurelius can never want biographers, eulogists, or historians.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request in one of the resolutions of Congress, of the 21st of December last, I transmitted a copy of those resolutions, by my Secretary, Mr. Shaw, to Mrs. WASHINGTON, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character; of their condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence; and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General GEORGE WASHINGTON in the manner expressed in the first resolution. As the sentiments of that virtuous lady, not less beloved by this nation than she is at present greatly afflicted, can never be so well expressed as in her own words, I transmit to Congress her original letter.

It would be an attempt of too much delicacy to make any comments upon it; but there can be no doubt that the nation at large, as well as all the branches of the Government, will be highly gratified by any arrangement which may diminish the sacrifice she makes of her individual feelings.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1800.

The letter is as follows:

SIR: While I feel with keenest anguish the late dispensation of Divine Providence, I cannot be insensible to the mournful tributes of respect and veneration which are paid to the memory of my dear deceased husband; and, as his best services, and most anxious wishes, were always devoted to the welfare and happiness of his country, to know that they were truly appreciated and gratefully remembered affords no inconsiderable consolation.

Taught by the great example which I have so long had before me, never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by Congress which you have had the goodness to transmit to me; and, in doing this, I need not, I cannot, say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

With grateful acknowledgments, and unfeigned thanks, for the personal respect and evidences of condolence, expressed by Congress and yourself, I remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

On motion, of Mr. ROSS, that it be

JANUARY, 1800.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice President of the United States, and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for those officers in the different States:

A motion was made to amend the motion by adding, "and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, was of opinion that this was a subject on which Congress had no right to legislate. When the Constitution undertook to make provisions on a subject, if they were found incomplete, or defective, they must be remedied by recommending an amendment to the Constitution. He wished the gentleman who had made this motion would pay further attention to the subject, and believed he would find that if anything was to be done it must be done by proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. ROSS said, that the Constitution had certainly made no provision on this subject. It only directed that after the votes were received, &c., the President of the Senate should, in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, open the certificates, and the votes should be counted. Suppose, said he, persons should claim to be Electors, who had never been properly appointed, should their vote be received? Suppose they should vote for a person to be President who had not the age required by the Constitution, or who had not been long enough a citizen of the United States, or for two persons who were both citizens of the same State—such cases might happen and were very likely to happen, and is there no remedy? What a situation would the country be in if such a case was to happen! He thought it their duty to make provision for it, and he believed a law was sufficient.

Mr. C. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, thought it a very dangerous practice to endeavour to amend the Constitution by making laws for the purpose. The Constitution was a sacred deposit, put into their hands; they ought to take great care not to violate or destroy the essential provisions made by that instrument. He remembered very well that in the Federal Convention great care was used to provide for the election of the President of the United States, independently of Congress; to take the business as far as possible out of their hands. The votes are to be given by Electors appointed for that express purpose, the Electors are to be appointed by each State, and the whole direction as to the manner of their appointment is given to the State Legislatures. Nothing was more clear to him than that Congress had no right to meddle with it at all; as the whole was entrusted to the State Legislatures, they must make provision for all questions arising on the occasion.

Mr. DEXTER, of Massachusetts, did not feel himself at all in doubt as to the right of the Legislature to make such provisions on this subject as appeared to be necessary. It was directed by the Constitution that a President should be appointed, that he should be of not less than thirty-five years of age, that he should have been at least fourteen years a citizen of the United States, &c. The proceedings in the election of a President may be defective in all these particulars, and can it be supposed that there is no way to correct them? The Constitution is not silent on this head; among the powers given to Congress in the 5th section is this, "to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The law now proposed appears to be necessary to carry into effect the power of appointing the President; it is therefore clearly Constitutional.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, never felt less doubt on any subject than the one now under consideration: the Constitution has given many directions as to the appointment of the President, some of which he read. Is it possible (said Mr. L.) that gentlemen can suppose all these may be violated and disregarded, and yet that it is nobody's business to interpose, and make provision to prevent it? He trusted the honorable Senate would agree to the resolution to appoint a committee for that purpose.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Georgia, expressed his regret that the mover of this resolution had not thought proper to bring forward a subject so new and important, in the form commonly used in parliamentary assemblies, by a single proposition, viz: "that it is expedient that further provision be made respecting disputed votes for President and Vice President of the United States." It was manifest from the debate that several different questions had been under consideration at the same time, and different gentlemen were in fact directing their remarks to different questions.

The first question was, the one he had just mentioned, whether there was so great a defect in the present provisions, which exist on this subject, as to render further provisions necessary?

The second is, if further provisions are necessary, must they be made by amendment to the Constitution? or,

Thirdly, whether they can be made by law?

He must say, for himself, that he did not agree that the present provisions on this subject were so defective and absurd as had been represented. His general respect for those who had gone before him in this House, and especially for the venerable assembly of the most experienced statesmen of the country by whom the Constitution had been formed, forbade him to entertain the belief that this subject, which is the strong feature that characterizes this as an Elective Government, could have been till now so entirely out of sight and neglected. Gentlemen appeared to him, from their observations, to forget that the Constitution in directing Electors to be appointed throughout the United States equal to the whole number of the Senators and Representatives in Congress, for the express purpose of entrusting this Constitutional branch of power to them, had provided for the existence of as respectable a body as Congress, and in whom the Constitution on this business has more confidence than in Congress. Experience had proved that a more venerable selection of characters could not be made in this country than usually composed that electoral body. And what are the questions which can arise on the subject entrusted to them to which they are incompetent, or to which Congress is so much more competent? The questions which present themselves seem to be:

1. Those which relate to the elections, returns, and qualifications, of their own members. Shall these be taken away from that body, and submitted to the superior decision and control of Congress, without a particle of authority for it from the Constitution?

2. The legality or constitutionality of the different steps of their own proceedings, as, whether they vote for two persons both of the same State; whether they receive votes for a person under thirty-five years of age, or one who has not been fourteen years a citizen of the United States &c. It is true they, as well as any other Constitutional branch of this Government acting under that instrument, may be guilty of taking unconstitutional or corrupt steps, but they do it at their peril. Suppose either of the other branches of the Government, the Executive, or the Judiciary, or even Congress, should be guilty of taking steps which are unconstitutional, to whom is it submitted, or who has control over it, except by impeachment? The Constitution seems to have equal confidence in all the branches on their own proper ground, and for either to arrogate superiority, or a claim to greater confidence, shows them in particular to be unworthy of it, as it is in itself directly unconstitutional.

3. The authentication of their own acts. This would seem to be as complete in them, as in either of the other branches of the Government. Their own authentication of their act finishes the business entrusted to them. It is true this must be judged of by the persons who are concerned in carrying it into execution; as in all laws and official acts under this Government, they to whom they are directed, and who are to be bound by them, must judge, and judge at their peril, whether they are duly authenticated or whether they are only a forgery.

If this be the just view of the subject, (and he could see no other which did not involve inextricable difficulties,) it leaves no possible question for the Senators and Representatives, when met together to count the votes agreeably to the Constitution, but to judge of the authentication of the act of the Electors, and then to proceed and count the votes as directed. If this body of the Electors of all the States had been directed by the Constitution to assemble in one place, instead of being formed into different Electoral colleges, he took it for granted none of the questions on which this resolution has been brought forward, would have occurred; every one would have acknowledged that they were to be settled in that assembly. It having been deemed more safe by the Constitution to form them into different Electoral colleges, to be assembled in the several States, does not at all alter the nature or distinctness of their powers, or subject them any more to the control of the other departments of the Government.

He observed further, on the other points to which gentlemen had spoken, that if such radical and important changes were to be made on this subject, as seemed to be in contemplation under this resolution, he thought they must be made by proposing an amendment to the Constitution to that effect; and that they could not be made by law, without violating the Constitution. He did not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. DEXTER,) that the clause at the close of the 8th section of the Constitution, which gives to Congress power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the foregoing powers of that section, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof, could be extended to this case; that speaks of the use of the powers vested by the Constitution—this resolution relates to the formation of a competent and essential part of the Government itself: that speaks of the movements of the Government after it is organized; this relates to the organization of the Executive branch, and is therefore clearly a Constitutional work, and to be done, if at all, in the manner pointed out by the Constitution, by proposing an article of amendment to the Constitution on that subject. His own opinion, however, was, what he had before stated, that the provisions on this subject were already sufficient; that all the questions which had been suggested were as safely left to the decision of the assemblies of Electors, as of any body of men that could be devised; and that the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, when met together in one room, should receive the act of the Electors as they would the act of any other Constitutional branch of the Government, to judge only of its authentication, and then to proceed to count the votes, as directed in the second article of the Constitution.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed.

FRIDAY, January 24.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill, sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for salvage in cases of recapture," reported further amendments.

Ordered, That they be printed for the use of the Senate.

Drawing Juries by Lot.

JANUARY, 1800.

DRAWING JURIES BY LOT.

Mr. PINCKNEY, agreeably to notice given on the 23d instant, asked leave to bring in a bill to establish a uniform mode of drawing juries by lot, in all the Courts of the United States; and, leave being granted, the bill was read.

On motion to agree to the second reading of the bill, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bingham, Bloodworth, Brown, Chipman, Cocke, Dexter, Foster, Franklin, Goodhue, Greene, Gunn, Hillhouse, Howard, Langdon, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, Paine, Pinckney, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

On introducing the above bill, Mr. PINCKNEY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Agreeably to the notice I gave, I rise to introduce a measure which appears to me of the highest importance to this country; it is for the purpose of introducing a bill to establish a uniform mode of drawing juries by lot in the Courts of the United States. On this occasion it will be unnecessary for me to go into an examination of the nature and excellence of the trial by jury, further than to remark, that we must all consider a fair and impartial one as next in point of importance to an uncorrupt or unbiassed choice of the Legislature. On the integrity and impartial decisions of our juries, depend not only the lives and properties, but what is infinitely dearer to freemen, their privileges, and characters. Your Legislature and your juries are the foundation upon which your freedom must rest. The Constitution has declared our citizens shall always enjoy the benefit of both; but the particular modifications under which the right of trial by jury shall be extended to them, depend upon the Legislature. It is to endeavor to rectify what I conceive to be a fatal error on this subject, that I now address you—I do so in the most perfect confidence that I shall be heard with that attention the importance of the subject is entitled to; that, on one so interesting to every part of the community, gentlemen will leave themselves open to conviction; that the principles and best mode of establishing impartial justice will be sought for, and that, when discovered, they will be suffered to prevail.

I will begin by expressing my astonishment that in framing the law for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States, its forms did not only establish one uniform mode, but that in doing so, they did not without hesitation give the preference to the drawing jurors by lot—a mode long in use in several of the States, where the excellent effects it has produced has proved it to be incontestably the best that has ever been devised, for producing complete and impartial justice. This being the great object of our judiciary, I hope the House will upon the present occasion throw all party views and opinions out of the question; that they will recollect it is not for the present moment, or to answer any temporary purposes, this regulation is intended; that it is one springing from the habits and opinions of our citizens, and the nature of our Government; that it is intended to be ingrafted upon our judiciary, and remain as a bulwark, constructed to resist all the storms of power, of privilege, or of faction, that may hereafter assail it. It will be necessary, before we go into an examination of the bill I intend to produce, to state to you the defects of your jury system as it stands at present, and the danger and inconvenience it produces.

The introduction of juries was intended to serve as a barrier against tyranny, and to be the guardian of the private rights and privileges of the people. Well and impartially selected, they are certainly the most complete defence against oppression, and the most certain means of producing impartial justice, that ever the ingenuity of mankind could discover; this and the representative principle are unquestionably the greatest efforts of the human mind; and they are blessings unknown to the ancients, which I trust our country will carry further and more completely into operation, and make them more a public blessing to our own than they have yet been to any nation. It is true we borrowed our jurisprudence from England, but weak and lame indeed is the administration of justice in that country to what I hope it will be in this. While their judges are appointed by the Crown—some of them holding seats in Parliament, all of them constantly looking to the Monarch for further honors and emoluments, and removable by an address of both Houses, which a Minister can always command—while their juries are summoned at will by a sheriff, Heaven forbid we should not exceed them in the purity and impartiality of our judicials! As they first taught us the value and importance of an independent judiciary, we will in return transmit them our improvements and teach them by our example to perfect their own; we will, too, I hope, be the means of extending it to other nations—for no pride can certainly be a more honest one than that of wishing our country to take the lead, and be an example to the world in everything that may tend to their freedom and happiness.

One great defect in our present jury system is, that it introduces an inequality in the proceedings of our courts. In some districts the juries are drawn by lot in one mode, and in other districts drawn in a different one; in many they are not drawn by lot at all, but summoned at the will of the marshal; whereas in courts emanating from the same authority, held by the same judges, and administering the same laws, there should be an uniformity in all the proceedings. Another is, that the districts or portions of territory out of which the juries are to be drawn, are not precisely fixed; but, in many instances, perhaps in all, it is left to the clerk and marshal to draw or summon them as they please; whereas the boundaries of the counties or districts from which they are to be drawn, ought to be so fixed as to leave no discretion on this subject to the officers of the court, and while a sufficient number of jurors are secured to answer the end, to prevent them being drawn at such distances as would probably produce inconvenience or delay, or in many instances inevitable absence. But, sir, the greatest of all its defects, is the placing it at all in the power of the marshal to exercise his discretion in so important a manner as to select a jury as he pleases. The danger and consequences of this power vested in a ministerial officer, appointed by the President, holding his office during his pleasure, and looking up to him for other and more honorable and lucrative appointments, appear to me not only to be one of the greatest evils under which a part of the American people at present labor, but one which does not seem, before this, to have claimed from them or their Government the attention due to its importance. It is for this reason I have thought it my duty to bring it to your view at this time; and I do not hesitate to confess that I shall even consider it as one of the most fortunate moments of my life, that I have had an opportunity of first moving in a question on which the true freedom and happiness of our country so much depends. Should I succeed even partially—should I be the means of producing only an alteration of the present unjust and oppressive system, and lay a foundation for a complete and perfect one hereafter, it will amply compensate me for all the remarks and odium which the mover in so important a reform must naturally expect.

Viewing, as I do, impartial juries as among the most indispensable ingredients of a free Government, it is my duty to declare, and I solemnly do deliver it as my opinion, that in those States in which the federal marshals have a right to summon jurors as they please, the people are not free; that in those States the impartiality of your judicial tribunals, and the purity of the administration of justice, must depend not on the laws but the integrity and honest independence of a marshal; to him is left the monstrous and dangerous power of summoning proper or improper, fit or unfit, dishonest or upright men—men who may be the friends or enemies to the parties who are on their trial, or who on political questions may be known to be opposed to them, and to hold opinions diametrically contrary to those which are perhaps in the course of the trial to be submitted to them for their decision.

Who can deny that on the wise or oppressive, the unbiassed or corrupt use of this power must depend the decisions of our judiciary, in every case where party spirit runs high, and where it may be an object of great moment to influence the proceedings of a marshal? On a public and political question, any man can tell the danger and impropriety of such a power vested in an individual. But not only on questions of a public or political nature, but even in private cases, where the object in dispute is considerable, and where the parties have extensive concerns, no man ought to possess the power of summoning, as his friendships or hatreds, his caprice or perhaps something worse, may direct him, the jury who are to decide questions on which not only the fortune and happiness of individuals, but the character of some laws, and sometimes the faith of treaties, may depend.

I will for a moment consider this dangerous power in a marshal, as it respects the public, on all questions in which the lives or characters of our citizens, may be concerned—on charges against them of a political nature, as well as in those entirely of a private nature, in which public questions are not at all involved.

With respect to those of a public nature, I must confess that when I first arrived here, and discovered the precarious and unsafe tenure on which the citizens of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and I believe New Jersey, held everything that freemen ought to consider as most dear—when I was informed that on every question respecting character, life, or fortune, the men who were to decide were to be picked or selected by a sheriff or a marshal, and not impartially drawn by lot, it was difficult for me to find words sufficiently expressive of my astonishment. I could scarcely believe that a people so enlightened, and so jealous of their liberties—a people who have had before their eyes, and in their very neighborhood, such excellent examples, in this respect, as the Eastern and Southern States, could have so long neglected a reform more precious to them than any other they could adopt. It has been since to me a source of much surprise that the State Legislatures, in the administration of justice within their own States, did not at once perceive and correct a system which, under a partial or oppressive use of it, places it so much in the power of an officer to stain the character of a nation and violate its most sacred obligations. This inattention is, however, I trust, now at an end, the subject is brought to their view, and the question is fairly before them; they are now to determine whether their exertions are in future to have all important questions respecting their dearest interests depend upon juries, impartially drawn by lot, under the regulations of laws equally affecting all, and whose provisions no sheriff or marshal can violate or interfere with; or to entirely rest with a sheriff or marshal, on whose integrity, knowledge, or impartiality, or on whose want of these essential qualities, is to depend the pure or corrupt administration of their laws. In a word, with the State Legislatures it now remains to be determined whether the citizens of the States I have mentioned are to be less free and less entitled to the inestimable privilege of trial by a fair and impartial jury, than their brethren in the Eastern and Southern States.

By the law of Congress now in force, juries are to be designated by lot or otherwise, in the manner now in use in the several States. From this it is to be presumed that whether Congress agree or not to the general reform I shall introduce, they will certainly always consent to a law conforming the practice of the several courts to the mode in use in the States where these federal courts are held. Hence it becomes highly important to these States, and their citizens, to insist that the State Legislatures shall alter their modes as soon as possible: they should make it an indispensable compact with the persons they elect to represent them; they should consider it as more dear to them than any other public act they could attend to. For how can that Government or that people be free, where the execution of their laws is to depend upon the will of an individual? How can any man whose political opinions differ from a marshal, be safely tried for any political offence touching his life, his character, or his fortune, while the political character of the jury, who are to try him, depends upon the selection of a marshal? Suppose for instance, a man is charged with a libel against the President of the United States; that this libel charges the President with acts of so important a nature and so injurious to the welfare of the Union, that, unless they can be removed or the writer convicted of a libel and punished, the President would be likely to lose the confidence of the people, and consequently his re-election to office; that the marshal of the district knows this; that the President's feelings are alive to the decision; that he feels his public character, the affections of the people in his principles, and his re-election to office all at stake: that, in short, it is of the utmost consequence to him, this person should be convicted and humbled. Under these circumstances, is it not expecting more than we have generally a right to expect from him, or natural to suppose, that the marshal will feel himself entirely unmoved; that he will carefully select moderate men, who are not attached particularly to party, and who will really compose so impartial a jury as to give the defendant a fair chance of having justice done him? Or is it not more correct to suppose, that in such a case a marshal will recollect that it was from the President he received his office; that he holds it at his pleasure; that if in a case so important to the President and where his feelings are so much alive, the marshal should be lukewarm or make a selection of men not approved, he would probably lose his office; but that if he should exert himself, array a decided jury, whose opinions on politics were not to be shaken, and procure a conviction, that the President would not be unmindful of his zeal, and that amongst the numerous lucrative appointments in his gift the marshal would not be forgotten? I ask if this is not the proper mode to reason a question of this sort? I allude not to particular cases. On general subjects where I conceive it my duty to act, I condescend not to mention anything that may have happened. I am endeavoring to regulate for the future. I thank Heaven that in the State to which I belong, juries are on the best establishment. I wish, for the honor of the United States, and the character of their judiciary, that the same purity and impartiality in the administration of justice should pervade the whole; that equal laws, and not the opinions or wishes of individuals, should govern in their decisions, and that the principles which were among the leading objects of the American Revolution, should forever obtain and be insured to our citizens: until they do, it is in vain for the people of those States to think that while their juries are summoned at will by a marshal, they are free—or that the citizens of the other States, having impartial juries, will ever think of removing to reside among them, or trust themselves or their fortunes under laws whose administration is so unsafe and precarious. Nor can there be a doubt, that when the difference in this important part of their Government comes to be, as it will hereafter, perfectly understood, that in emigrations to this country, the enlightened foreigner will prefer living in States having impartial juries, to those in which, in every act and almost word of his life, he is to be at the mercy of a marshal, holding his office at the will of a President. This difference between Pennsylvania, Virginia, and the other States I have mentioned, and Southern ones, places the former in so unequal not to say degrading a situation with respect to the administration of justice, that I will not for a moment suppose they will any longer submit to so improper a system. I can never believe that when the subject has been fairly brought to their view, that States so enlightened, and so distinguished by their love of republican liberty, will feel themselves easy until they have obliged the State Legislatures to adopt the mode of drawing juries by lot. It is in vain to think of repealing seditious laws, or asserting the liberty of the press, as secured by the Constitution, until this reform takes place. This power in a marshal, is a more complete and severe check on the press, and the right of the people to remark on public affairs, than ten thousand seditious laws, because here the power to select and by that means govern the opinion of juries, is continual, always increasing, and in a great degree subject on every trial to the wishes and directions of a President. In times of party, when opinions run high, and contending factions oppose each other with violence, it is then truly dreadful. Justice, which has been represented and ought forever to be blind to the political opinions of men, becomes on these occasions as keen-eyed as the eagle, it pounces into every recess and corner of a State, drags forth the avowed and political enemies of the accuser, and arrays them on his jury. I will hope, for the freedom of our country, this has not yet taken place; but that it may, and that it should be guarded against, no man will deny. Let us, by adopting the model I recommend, or something like it, give to our citizens the comfort of reflecting that amidst the storms and conflicts which may attend a republican form, they will, on every question respecting their lives, characters, or fortunes, be always entitled to a fair and impartial trial by jury, secured by equal laws, the impartial election of which no man however elevated or no officer however willing can dare to control or interfere with. It is our duty to give to our citizens this valuable reform. They have a right, from the nature of our Government, to expect it; amidst all the fluctuations of parties and changes of men and measures, it will be to them a solid consolation to reflect that their private rights are secure, and that, with respect to these, their Government is indeed a Government of laws. Under this sacred guard the honest and the innocent may safely come to trial, nor will advocates be afraid to defend them, nor consider it as hopeless to attempt it. The people will revere your tribunals—they will then have no reason to fear that faction or corruption may curb your bench of justice, fill the seats of your jurors, or stain the annals of your judiciary with innocent blood sacrificed at the shrine of party or ambition; the dreadful evils which have disgraced the tribunals of other countries, will be avoided, and you will exhibit to an admiring and imitating world the finest and most unexceptionable form they have yet witnessed. Give them this improvement, and say that your judges, while they continue as such, shall hold no other offices, and we may safely defy any nation that has preceded us to exhibit a judiciary by any means comparable to the one we shall then possess.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," was read the third time.

Mr. PINCKNEY said, I feel much pleasure in being present at this discussion, because I have always wished that some parts of this bill, particularly those that relate to the delegation of the powers to the President, in the recess of Congress, should be maturely examined, in order that I might hear the reasons upon which, what appears to me, so unusual and unconstitutional a delegation of authority has taken place. Open as I always wish to be to conviction, it will give me much satisfaction to find that my doubts can be removed, and that the arguments I shall use against the bill can be answered and refuted. It is easily to be perceived that this bill is an important one to all the Union, but particularly to the Southern States. It will be my endeavor to show that very serious inconveniences have arisen from the former bill, which this is intended to revive, both to Virginia and Maryland, as well as to North and South Carolina and Georgia. I am not, it is true, so anxious about it as I was formerly, because I trust our Commissioners have used their powers so well, that an honorable and pacific arrangement with France will soon take place. I shall not, therefore, at this time, go into any observations on the nature and origin of our dispute with France, or give my opinions on that subject; they have already been frequently given and well known, nor do I see any reason to alter them. I have strong Constitutional objections to this bill, which it is my duty to state, and which compel me not to suffer it to pass with a silent vote.

The precedents, sir, which any measures that are unconstitutional furnish, and the abuses to which they may be converted, are always to be guarded against. I have said, on a former occasion, that improper doctrines or precedents, whether under the form of resolutions or of laws, if not early opposed, were strengthened by time, and became liable to be applied to pernicious purposes. Upon examining the laws which are contained in the fourth volume, and which have been passed since March, 1797, there is reason to apprehend the precedents established by some of them, may hereafter be more inconvenient in their consequences to our peace and safety than even that sort of maritime warfare, in which alone there is ever any danger of this country being engaged with an European Power. The present bill I consider of the like character, and I therefore very earnestly hope that a pacific arrangement will be concluded, which may prevent the effects I am afraid this additional precedent will afford. I consider it as springing from the same source with most of the measures which have been agitated for the last two years, particularly the provisional army, and as going to establish the precedent of granting to the Executive powers, in my judgment, unwarranted by the Constitution—of paving the way to that Executive and Ministerial influence in the affairs of our Government which may hereafter render the Representative part of it, and the direction and influence they ought to have, more a name than anything else. It is astonishing to me, that, having the examples on this point of another nation before us—examples which we must recollect were held forth by Congress, during the Revolutionary war, in the strongest language, as beacons to warn us of similar dangers—we should, at so early a day, be preparing to precipitate ourselves into the same system.

Look to Great Britain, from the first day of the present monarch's reign, and see what has been the progression of Executive and Ministerial influence there, within that time. Let any gentleman attentively examine the book entitled, "The history of the two acts passed, one for the preservation of the King's person against treasonable practices and attempts, and the other to prevent seditious practices and assemblies," and there will he find the best account I have met with, of the measures which have been pursued, step by step, to establish this Ministerial and Executive influence, until, by the confession of the most able and moderate of their own writers, the all-controlling power of the Minister is now such, that he can always direct their Parliament as he pleases, and plunge them in any war his personal resentment or self-interest may prompt him to, regardless of the expense or true interests of the nation. This enormous power in the hands of their Executive and Ministers, and the total loss of influence in the Representative part of their Government, must be attributed not to any one, but to a variety of measures, successively introduced, at first little suspected, but at length, under the sanction of precedent, increased to an alarming extent. Some gentlemen, who view such acts as the present improper, are averse to opposing them, because they think they see intuity in the attempt. I differ from them extremely, and consider it as the duty of every member to express his sentiments on such measures as appear improper, and to resist them, even though satisfied of the immediate inefficiency of that opposition, as it serves to keep the public mind awake to its safety and the conduct of their constituted authorities.

This bill is a branch of that system which has been pursued by the friends and supporters of the present Administration, for two or three years, with constant and too effectual perseverance, for increasing the power of the Executive. In a former session, we have seen a large army voted, which has since been partly raised, and is now resolved to be reduced. There was also an act authorizing the President to raise, if in his opinion the danger was so great as to require it, 10,000 men, as a provisional army, and, of his own and sole authority, to commission all the officers; there was also in this act, a clause authorizing the President to accept of the service of volunteer corps, and to appoint all the commissioned officers; although there is an express clause in the Constitution, which says, that the appointment of all the officers of the militia, who may be employed in the service of the United States, shall be reserved to the States respectively. I must confess, I view this delegation to the President, of the power to raise this provisional army or not, as in his opinion the danger of our situation may require, and the power intended to be given by this bill, to remit the prohibition of intercourse, and renew it again, with the whole, or any part of the French dominions, as he pleases, as so intimately connected, and as standing so precisely on the same principles, that although it may not be perfectly in order, yet, in considering the one, I cannot help glancing at the other, as they both serve to bring before you the important question, how far the Constitution authorizes Congress to delegate to the President the exercise of such extensive powers. I have no doubt, in my own mind, that the Constitution does not authorize the delegation of these authorities, and it is among the reasons that induce me to vote against this bill. It will be granted that no powers are more important to a nation than those to regulate commerce, and to declare war—these, therefore, are both exclusively given to Congress. It is observable, that although the power to make peace is given to the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, yet, that so guarded is the Constitution upon the subject of war, that this is given to Congress—they alone can declare war, they alone can regulate commerce; nor can they constitutionally delegate this exercise of their authorities, by any limitations they can annex to the manner in which their agent is to execute them: they are powers so great, and so important to the peace and dearest interests of the people, that they are vested in Congress—they, and they alone, are to judge from the circumstances before them, whether war, or measures that may in their tendency involve a war, are expedient. With them also rests the power to say what shall be the nature of our commerce, or the regulations necessary to its rights and safety; with whom and under what conditions it shall be carried on; with what nations, and for what time it shall be interdicted. And are not these powers so great that they ought never to be exercised but by the representatives of the people? In giving to them exclusively the powers of war and commerce, does not the grant include all their incidental authorities? Where is the part of the Constitution which authorizes their delegation of them? If it has wisely said, that delicate and important powers like these ought only to be exercised by the representatives of the people—that they are the only safe depositories of them; that they ought to judge when measures are to be adopted, which may in their consequences lead to war—that they alone ought to judge how far commercial prohibitions, extending to a whole nation and its territories, ought to be carried, when removed, and when again renewed—can they delegate this authority without interfering with the intentions of the Constitution? The design of that instrument clearly was, that no individual should possess the dangerous power of involving this country in war, or of regulating its commerce; and yet will any man deny, that the powers here delegated are not such as may, by an unwise or precipitate use of them, lead inevitably to war? In the act I have alluded to, respecting the provisional army, how great is the power given to an individual, to raise or not, as he pleases, an army of 10,000 men, and in the present to open or shut the intercourse with the dominions of one of the greatest Powers in the world! Is not this, as far as those dominions extend, and during the continuance of the law, completely giving to the President the power to regulate commerce? Are not, in fact, these continued delegations adding to the precedents for establishing an Executive influence in this country, which may one day increase to what it is in England? We know what it is there, and we begin to see what it may be here; it must ever be too great here, by what I have always considered as improper in the Constitution, the giving to the President the nomination to all offices. But if we are perpetually to add to it in this manner, there will be no knowing where it will end. Only consider what would have been the patronage of a whole army, and the immense power of opening either wholly or partially a trade so important as this is, and shutting it at his pleasure. If he should determine to open it at some fixed period, he cannot lock up this in his own breast. He has executive officers he always consults, and must they not know, and may they not have commercial and other friends to whom they may entrust so important a secret? Is it not possible such things may happen? Has not rumor been already busy on this subject? Have we not heard complaints about the manner in which the trade to St. Domingo was carried on last year, or have they not yet reached this or the other branch? But whether they have or not, or any improper conduct has taken place, is not so great a power open to the abuse and evils I have mentioned? Is it not vesting a power unauthorized by the Constitution, and adding immensely to that Executive influence which has already become too great? The only truly vulnerable part in our Constitution is the patronage of the Executive, and the establishment of that undue influence in our councils, which may one day contribute to destroy the important agency which the nature of our Government, and the safety of the people, always require the representative part of it to possess. This I have already observed must always be too great, by the Constitution giving to the President the right to nominate to all offices, and his agency in the formation of treaties. To balance and in some degree to correct this too great influence in the Executive, it ought to be the care of Congress never to add to it, if it can be avoided with any kind of convenience, lest they should destroy their own necessary and Constitutional weight in the Government. That as they alone are authorized to put their hands into the pockets of their constituents, they only ought to judge and decide upon those great legislative questions, which may lead to requisitions for money or to cramp or touch the means by which alone our citizens can furnish it. That the power to adopt measures that may in their tendency lead to or touch the subject of war or commerce, is so intimately connected with the power to tax, that we may just as well suppose Congress can delegate the right to the President to lay and levy taxes as they can the authority to regulate commerce in the way this bill proposes. I will suppose a case, that Congress should be of opinion a sum of money might possibly be wanted during their recess; that they were to determine the amount, and vest the President with the power to call for it or not, as he should please; but if he did require it, he should have the authority to lay and levy taxes for that purpose. Suppose an attempt of this sort was made, and that the Executive should levy taxes on houses and lands, and except from the tax money at interest, stock, or that kind of property which he wishes to favor; could you justify the delegation of such authority, or wonder at the abuse of it? No gentleman will say such a delegation could constitutionally be made. Yet you can delegate with infinitely more safety the regulation of taxes than of commerce, because, by the means of commerce, you not only give an arbitrary power over the natural wealth of a particular State, or part of a nation, but you give a power which enables the person trusted with it at all times to involve the country in war, by granting particular favors to one nation, or a part of a nation, which are denied to another. Who will undertake to say, that by such a power over the commerce of a country, it may not at any time be involved in war? Yet you cannot, by the Constitution, delegate the right to make war. How then can we rush into so great an inconsistency, as to give, indirectly, a power which is directly precluded from delegation?

This bill not only goes to keep up the present state of things with France, but may, by a part of it, eventually involve you in a war with Spain, a Power with which you are not only upon friendly terms at present, but carry on one of the most lucrative branches of your foreign commerce—I mean the trade with Cuba. You have by this bill declared, that for its purposes, the whole of Saint Domingo should be considered as a dependency of France, notwithstanding it is well known that the Spanish part of it is in possession of their Government and its officers, and ought to be considered as a part of the Spanish territories, until it has been formally delivered to the French, and their officers govern it. It may be said that we know, by the treaty between Spain and France, it was ceded to the latter; but how can we be sure that since that period some secret agreement has not taken place, and that it is returned to Spain? Is it not probable, by her keeping possession, that it is so; and ought not the delivery of the place, and the change of rulers and laws, to be the criterion with us for judging to what power a territory belongs? Can the annexing the Spanish part of that island to the French, for the purposes of this bill, be an object with us to risk the enmity of Spain, and the loss of the Havana trade to our merchants? I should suppose not; and that this new section is an unnecessary and impolitic one, and ought not to be adopted.

I come now to the policy of continuing this bill at all, or, if at all, whether it can be politic to extend it, as the last mentioned section proposes; or whether it would not be better to narrow its limits, and the territories it is to affect. I know it is a favorite theme with the Government, that until a peace is established with France, we must preserve our attitude, and keep up all the measures of defence that have been gone into, to protect us from her hostility. When, therefore, we see several of those measures either relaxed in or altered, or no measures taken to renew them; such, for instance, as stopping the enlistments for the army, and not reviving the alien law, or pushing the building of the seventy-fours, it is a strong proof that Government and its friends think there is a sincerity in the offers of the French, and that our negotiations will terminate successfully. Honorable peace, therefore, being our great object, may not suffering this act to expire without renewal, or if revived, by lessening its restrictions, and the places it is to operate upon, hold out such confidence, on the part of our Government, in the sincerity and justice of the French administration, as may be the best means of insuring future conciliation and friendship? No great danger can arise to our commerce, for few of our merchants will venture, until they know that peace is made; and if the reports which are in circulation are true, that they have ordered their cruisers to respect our neutral rights, the risks will be very small.

I have no doubt, myself that peace will be made; it is peculiarly the interest of France to have it, and this cannot be unknown to or undesired by the consummate politician who now directs her affairs. I am sure it is the wish of every gentleman to do all in his power to promote the desirable end of honorable peace, particularly of those from the Southern States. It is on them the weight of the loss of the commercial intercourse with France has principally fallen. The Northern and Eastern States have not been without feeling their share of the loss of an intercourse with its European dominions, and, until August, with the West Indies; but from Maryland inclusively to Georgia, has the loss been greatest. Our whole exports were 78,664,000 dollars, of which 33,142,000 are of domestic growth, and upwards of 45 millions of foreign. Of our domestic growth, nearly ten millions of pounds of cotton, and very little short of one hundred thousand hogsheads of tobacco are exported. Flour and rice are also considerable articles; upwards of 110,000 barrels of rice being exported, and principally from South Carolina. It will be easily seen, that if in the exports of these articles, the French market had been open, and added to the other European markets, that in the sales of our tobacco, cotton, flour, and rice, the prices must have been greatly increased. From some regulations I am informed of in the custom-houses, I have not been able particularly to ascertain the amount of exports from each State to France. I am told, that the exports from Philadelphia, for 1796, were, to France, 913,880 dollars; to the French Antilles, 3,250,584; to the islands of France and Bourbon, 20,967. This being the export from that city alone, we may easily judge how great must be the amount of exports from all the States, and how important this intercourse is. I have been credibly informed, that while the Virginia and North Carolina tobacco planters, and the Georgia and South Carolina tobacco and rice planters were obliged at one time to take for their tobacco, four and five dollars per hundred here, that that article was selling in France at fifty dollars; and while the rice planters were obliged to take six and seven shillings, that rice sold there at upwards of thirty-eight livres; and that cotton is now selling there at a price which is so great, that the moment the intercourse is opened, there is no knowing to what an amount the price of cotton in Georgia and South Carolina will be increased. Although the Northern States may suffer in some degree in having the intercourse with France stopped, they are by no means injured in proportion with the Southern States, because the Northern have an important commerce direct with the East Indies, which is scarcely known, and not at all pursued, in the Southern States: they therefore by no means feel the loss occasioned by this intercourse as much as we do. View the price of tobacco at this moment, and what was the low price of rice, until the accident of a scarcity in England has given it for the present a rise. Indeed, to any man the least acquainted with the subject, there can be no difficulty in asserting, that on the Southern States has the loss of this intercourse principally fallen, and that whenever the American Government shall deem it expedient to stop it, the tobacco planters of Virginia and Maryland, and the rice, cotton, and tobacco planters of Georgia and North and South Carolina will always have to bear the principal part of the loss. Nor do I believe, that this act has answered the end intended by it, which was to distress France, and deprive her of these articles, so necessary to her convenience. She has generally obtained them, notwithstanding our prohibition, by the way of Hamburg and Great Britain. It is true the French have had to pay higher for them by this circuitous route; but it is equally true, the Southern American planters have in consequence had to sell them at a lower price. It has entirely destroyed all competition in their market, and placed them entirely at the mercy of the Hamburg and British merchants. In short, it has contributed to make Great Britain principally, and Hamburg in a less degree, the depots of all American produce; for, while this intercourse is prohibited, we have scarcely any other market to send it to. We must entirely depend on the British market, and it operates, in point of commerce, almost as conveniently for them, as if we were still their colonies. In mentioning this, I desire by no means to be understood as intending to justify the conduct of France, in capturing our vessels, or refusing to treat with us. Their conduct was not only unjustifiable, but impolitic in the extreme; and their then rulers must have been blind to their own interests. But I have done it with a view to show the importance of the intercourse with France, whenever our national honor and safety permit, and that nothing but the most urgent necessity can justify our continuing the prohibitions a day longer than is necessary.

I consider it as my duty to make a remark here, which springs necessarily from the question—it is this: that as our original ground of dispute with France, was the illegal capture of our vessels, contrary to the law of nations, that we ought to convince France and the world that our conduct is intended to be equal to all nations; that it is not because they have any particular prejudice against France, that our Government adopt these measures, but because she has violated their neutral rights; and that whenever any other nation acts in a similar manner, our Government will use every exertion to remove the inconvenience, and endeavor, at least by examination and remonstrance, to have justice done to their citizens. I did, therefore, expect that long before this, some inquiry would have been made into the captures which have been alleged to be made of our vessels by other nations. It is loudly asserted in the papers, that a very great number of our vessels have been taken; and that, in a variety of instances, the most established principles of the laws of nations have been violated. If so, we have a right to expect the same measures of protection as were taken with respect to France, will now be afforded to our merchants against the depredations of any other Power, and that our Government will prove itself just and impartial in all its proceedings to every nation. I hope it will, and that all its operations may be so founded in wisdom and policy, as not only to restore to us the peace of our former friends, but to insure to us the blessings of an undisturbed commerce with all the world.

For the reasons I have mentioned, I shall vote against this bill. Indeed, if I was ever so much convinced of the propriety of continuing the prohibition until peace was made with France, I should vote against this bill, in its present form, on the ground that the delegation of power it contains, is unconstitutional; and that in our Government nothing can be more dangerous to its freedom and future fate, than the increase of the patronage and influence of the Executive—that it goes to destroy entirely the unbiased Constitutional agency of the Representative branch, and undermine our liberties, precisely in the manner that the ruin of every free government has been formerly occasioned.

“Men (says Algernon Sidney) are naturally prone to corruption, and if he whose interest and will it is to corrupt them, be furnished with the means, he will never fail to do it. Power, honors, riches, and the pleasures that attend them, are the baits by which men are drawn to prefer their personal interest before the public good; and the number of those who covet them is so great, that he who abounds in them will be able to gain so many to his service, as shall be able to subdue the rest. It is hard to find a tyranny in the world that has not been introduced this way; for no man by his own strength, could subdue a multitude; no one could ever bring many to be subservient to his ill designs, but by the rewards they received or hoped. By this means Cæsar accomplished his work, and overthrew the liberty of his country, and with it all that was then good in the world. They who were corrupted in their minds, desired to put all the power and riches into his hands, that he might distribute them to such as served him.”

With these reasonings of this illustrious patriot, to whose force it is impossible to add, I shall conclude my observations against the bill.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 10, as follows:

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 26th of February last, that an inquiry be had relative to a publication in a newspaper called the "Aurora," on the 19th of the said month; and agreed to insert after these words: "and by what authority he published the same," line 7th, the words "as having passed the Senate."

Mr. COCKE said, he would not suffer a measure of this kind to pass through the Senate, while he had the honor of a seat in that body, without manifesting the most determined opposition. What did the gentleman mean by avoiding the general principle? did he mean to get the consent of the Senate, acting in the character of an inquest, to an acknowledgment that the editor of the Aurora had been guilty of a crime, without any inquiry whether the publication in itself was criminal, or whether if it was criminal, the Senate, as an independent and a single branch of the Legislature, had of itself the power to define the crime and inflict the punishment? He could not consent to an admission of this kind; the Constitution gave them no such authority; the privileges of the House and of the members did not extend beyond the walls of the Chamber in which they were sitting, in cases of comment upon their official proceedings. He had held these opinions from the time the motion was first laid before the House, and thought that the consequences which would result from pursuing the subject, would be more dangerous to the honor and dignity of the Senate, which it was meant to defend, than all the attacks which all the public newspapers could make during their existence, inasmuch as an actual assumption of power was far more detrimental to their character than any unfounded charge of tyranny could be. He believed that the more the subject was agitated the more would be the clamor against the Senate, and in the end they would be forced to abandon the measure for want of ability to carry it through; he therefore concluded it would be best to give it up in the first instance, and save both their own time and the public money. He would move to postpone the consideration of the motion till the first Monday in December next.

Mr. TRACY did not wish to hurry on the decision, but as the resolution had been several days upon the table, he believed the House might now decide on the propriety of referring the business to the Committee of Privileges, as this procedure would not be final; or, if the House was not ready to vote immediately, the discussion might proceed and time would be given for coming to the conclusion.

Mr. C. PINCKNEY.—This subject involves the important questions, What are the privileges of Congress, and how far are they defined by the Constitution; and what is the liberty of the press, as it respects those privileges? These are subjects of great consequence, and such as I suppose the House will touch with much caution. My name having been mentioned in the body of the original motion I feel myself particularly called upon to deliver my sentiments fully, as well with respect to the manner in which it is mentioned, as to the limitations of the Constitution, and what ought, in my judgment, to be the conduct of the Senate, on this very interesting occasion.

In considering, first, what are the privileges of Congress, and how far they are defined by the Constitution, I am naturally led into a repetition of arguments I have found myself too frequently obliged to use on this floor; that is, to entreat the House to recollect the nature of our federal system; that all powers not expressly and specifically delegated to Congress, are reserved to the States and people; and particularly to remember, that where any powers are so expressly defined as the privileges of Congress are, that it is our duty very carefully to consider the consequences, before we take a step that may, by subsequent or cool reflection, be found to exceed them; that the privileges of Congress, as limited by the Constitution, have been very deliberately considered by men whose opinions were not swayed by party, and whose impartial situation gave the best opportunity of judging; that having before them the example of the unlimited privileges of the British Parliament, and colonial assemblies, or councils, assuming to themselves the right of such privileges; that knowing the consequences of undefined powers, and being well aware what privileges were necessary to prevent an interruption of the undisturbed situation a member should enjoy, during the time he is engaged on public affairs, after much thought they had defined them in the manner fixed by the Constitution. No man, who is a friend to order, will justify what properly deserves to be termed the licentiousness of the press. When, instead of candidly reviewing the arguments or public conduct of a member of the Legislature, or officer of the Government, it meanly descends to private scandal, instead of being defended, it should be met with contempt and disdain. Abuse is the price that public men, and frequently those of the most ability, are obliged to pay; and it is seldom, in countries where the press is free, and strong political parties are known to exist, that it is much noticed. Men of elevated minds, who feel themselves strong in the powers of reasoning, will always yield to their feeble opponents the miserable resort of abuse; it is the surest test of imbecility, and the public, who generally think right, seldom hesitate to suppose it equally the proof of weakness and of malice.

I shall consider this subject from its importance, and the peculiar manner in which it has been introduced, as open to such animadversions as are within the rules of order and are consistent with decorum. I shall probably advance doctrines that will be termed as extraordinary here, but it shall be done with the good manners I have ever considered as the criterion of good breeding, and which self-respect will forbid my violating. It is the first question respecting the privileges of the Senate that I have ever been present at, and, as it involves the liberty of the press, it is only necessary for me to mention these subjects, to show the House the propriety of our well-examining every line of the resolution on your table, before we adopt it.

I feel myself particularly called upon to give my opinion fully on this subject, because my name is inserted in the body of the resolution, and, to those unacquainted with the circumstances, it might have the appearance of being done at my request; whereas it was not only done without my knowledge, but is contrary to my wish, and opinion of the power of the House, and of the mode in which such inquiries should be conducted; that even if the House had the power, the remarks and information contained in the paper are not sufficiently important to attract its notice, particularly as they had been completely silent on the abuse of the Senate in the Gazette of the United States, respecting the stopping of the enlistments for the army; that the inquiry might lead to steps not within the defined privileges of the Senate, and that, as these may involve the liberty of the Press, and the right of a citizen to publish the debates and public acts of this House, those who were opposed to what they might consider unconstitutional restrictions, ought to meet the question at the threshold, and contest it in every stage. I shall therefore feel it peculiarly my duty to do so, and, after having stated to you my objections to any interference at all on this subject, to move the postponement of the resolution, or to amend it in some way that shall place on the journals my opinions of the extent of your privileges, and reasons for objecting to the mode of inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut.

In examining the Constitution, we find, that to prevent any attempt being made on the part of either branch of Congress, to define their own privileges, and exercise the same, as occasion or circumstances may, in their opinions, require, and to remove all doubt as to the extent and exercise of the privileges they are to enjoy, the Constitution has positively and expressly limited and defined the same, by declaring—

“That each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; that they may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide; that they may determine the rules of their proceedings, punish the members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. That the members of both Houses shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and, for any debate or speech in either House, shall not be questioned in any other place."

This is all that is said on the subject of privilege; and surely no words can be more explicit, nor any subject more clearly defined. The powers they are to exercise, and the persons and cases they are to operate upon, are all distinctly marked and named; nor is there a word or a sentence in the whole that can by any possible construction be made to mean that for any libels or printed attack on the public conduct or opinions of either House of Congress, or of any of its members, that their privilege shall extend to ordering the persons charged with the offence before them, and imprisoning them at their will. The Constitution wisely determined, that they should possess all the powers necessary to their formation, and the undisturbed order of their proceedings, and the safety of their members from arrest, during their attendance, and going to, and returning from Congress; but it at the same time recollected, that it is the nature of our Government to invite examinations of public measures, that it is the duty of our citizens to make these inquiries, to watch over the proceedings of our public bodies, and if they find them departing from the Constitution, or exceeding their authority, instantly to announce it. That our Constitution supposes no man, or body of men, to be infallible, but considers them all as mere men, and subject to all the passions, and frailties, and crimes, that men generally are, and accordingly provides for the trial of such as ought to be tried, and leaves the members of the Legislature, for their proceedings, to be amenable to their constituents and to public opinion; it however particularly guards the right of the citizen to investigate their measures; and in case of a false or libellous attack, it intends, if the power of collecting juries is fairly exercised, to provide a just and impartial tribunal to decide between them, to act upon oath, and who ought not to be the particular friends or enemies of either. On this subject I shall hereafter more fully remark, and at present take some little notice of an observation that has been made, and which, with the subject of privileges, should be considered as preliminary to those that are necessary on the liberty of the press. It is, that if Congress possessed the power contemplated by this resolution, it was their duty to pass some legislative act respecting it, declaring the manner in which it should be executed, and designating the officer or officers who were to do so; that the people would then know the manner in which offenders were to be summoned or apprehended, or brought before them; but this should have been done when no particular case had occurred, and was before them, and that no proceeding of privileges in any case like the present, ought to be had until such act was passed, and the mode of proceedings clearly ascertained; that if the power was given by the Constitution, until Congress had legislated upon it, in the manner above mentioned, it was extremely improper for either branch to attempt to exercise it; that a judiciary department was erected by the Constitution, but that Congress were obliged to legislate upon it, and detail its duties, and provide for the appointment of officers to execute them, before the powers of that department could be properly exercised; and that if Congress possessed the power some gentlemen contend for on this point, they must previously legislate on it in the same manner. On this subject there can be no doubt of the propriety of this objection, if Congress possessed the power; and their never having passed such a law is a strong proof, that whatever opinions either branch may have entertained, that both did not suppose they possessed this power, or certainly they would have legislated upon it. If they did not doubt, or were not sure they did not possess this authority, why did they not legislate on it at the time they did on all such other parts of their privileges and powers as they conceived they had authority to act on. They (that is, Congress) passed an act on the subject of the election of members of the House of Representatives, of which that House are the sole judges; each House detailed, in a particular manner, their rules and modes of proceeding—this was all that was necessary to be detailed. The remainder of the clause respecting privilege is so express on the subjects of privilege from arrest, government of members, and expulsion, that every civil officer in the United States, and every man who has the least knowledge, cannot misunderstand them. I assert, that it was the design of the Constitution, and that not only its spirit, but letter, warrant me in the assertion, that it never was intended to give Congress, or either branch, any but specified, and those very limited, privileges indeed. They well knew how oppressively the power of undefined privileges had been exercised in Great Britain, and were determined no such authority should ever be exercised here. They knew that in free countries very few privileges were necessary to the undisturbed exercise of legislative duties, and those few only they determined that Congress should possess; they never meant that the body who ought to be the purest, and the least in want of shelter from the operation of laws equally affecting all their fellow citizens, should be able to avoid them; they therefore not only intended, but did confine their privileges within the narrow limits mentioned in the Constitution. And here, sir, let me ask, are not these privileges all that are necessary? They have complete authority to keep order and decorum within their own chamber, to clear the galleries if an audience are unruly, and to punish their own members, to take care that no arrests, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace, shall keep their members from their duty, and for all libellous attacks or misrepresentations the laws are open to them; and if unjustly attacked, no doubt the juries of their countrymen, who are interested to preserve the dignity and independence of their Legislature, will give them the most ample satisfaction. But it is said, "each branch must possess this power to punish for breach of privileges, which they must judge of as circumstances may arise and require; that every legislative body, or branch of one, possesses an inherent right to protect itself, which must be exercised as their discretion directs, because it may frequently be necessary to exercise it immediately, when the public safety would make it impossible to wait for reference to other bodies, or tribunals," and, "that if a man was approaching to knock you down, it would be absurd, instead of defending yourself, to deliberate whether you were authorized to do so; that you must act instantly, as the occasion demands; and that as each individual in society possesses this inherent right to protect himself, so does each branch of the Legislature." This, as far I have been able to collect, is the sum of the reasoning on this subject; and it is said to be strengthened by the practice and precedents of the British Parliament, and the Colonial Legislatures, before the Revolution, and most of the State Legislatures since, and is now universally received as the true doctrine on this subject.

That it is the doctrine and practice of the British Parliament, I will allow; but it was because the doctrines there held are utterly inadmissible in a free Government; and to prevent any influence from them, and their precedents, and the improper practice of the Colonial and State Legislatures, that this limitation of the privileges of Congress was here purposely introduced. Will any man undertake to say, that the privilege of the Parliament of Great Britain ought to be that of the Congress of this country? Do you suppose that all their members, and their property, and even their servants, should be protected from arrests during the whole time they are elected for, many of them for twenty years together, or during their lives? Would it be thought safe in this country that a small majority of a small body, or single branch of a Legislature, should claim and exercise the authority, whenever they please, to send and seize any man in your community, however important, and confine him in a loathsome dungeon, for six months together, merely because he has differed with them in politics, and criticised, as he had a right to do, on their legislative acts? Is it a pleasant sight to our citizens, to see sergeants-at-arms, with their rods, inquisitorially seizing free-men, and dragging them to your bar, and there exhibiting them as criminals, or spectacles to crowded audiences, merely because they thought they had a right to attack, by argument, proceedings which appeared to them unconstitutional? Can you have the most distant idea, that your Constitution could have intended thus forever to shut the door of inquiry, and make it so penal and dangerous to your citizens that none of them will dare to venture it? Is it possible for any man to read the Constitution with attention, and then suppose that such could have been its design? So far from being so, I do assert that great pains were taken specially to guard against the exercise of any such power, and I have no doubt that the Congress of 1798 must have been of this opinion, or else why did they pass the 2d section of the sedition law? Why did they (improperly in my opinion, because it ought to belong to the State judicials) why did they make the crime of writing, uttering, publishing, or printing any libel against the President, or either branch of Congress, triable, and punishable, in the federal courts, if either branch possessed this power themselves? If they have the right to punish libels, or false, or malicious attacks, why include them in this act? Their power extends over the whole of the Union, and can reach any inhabitant, in any State. Is it not therefore clear, that by giving this authority to the federal judges, to try and punish for written or printed attacks on either branch of Congress, that the Congress of 1798 did not suppose, for attacks of this kind, made in the papers, there was any other mode of punishment than by a trial, where the person charged would have the benefit of trial by jury? Surely this must have been their opinion, or they would not have had two different modes of trial and punishment for the same offence. They never would have erected a new jurisdiction to include a crime, when one sufficiently strong and energetic existed already; but to prove this still more clearly, let us inquire, why the Constitution should have been so attentive to each branch of Congress, so jealous of their privileges, and have shewn so little to the President of the United States in this respect. Why should the individual members of either branch, or either branch itself, have more privileges than him? He is himself, as far as his qualified negative goes, a branch of the Legislature; he is, besides, your Executive, he is the sword of the law, and does he possess any privileges like these? If a man meets him walking alone in the streets and insults him, or if one of ruffian manners should enter his house, and even abuse him there, has your President any privileges like these? Can he commit and imprison without a trial? No sir, he must resort to the laws for satisfaction, where the person charged with the outrage will be heard, and where each party will have justice done them, by men who ought to be so impartially summoned as that no undue bias will be found when they come to decide. No privilege of this kind was intended for your Executive, nor any except that which I have mentioned for your Legislature. The Convention which formed the Constitution well knew that this was an important point, and no subject had been more abused than privilege. They therefore determined to set the example, in merely limiting privilege to what was necessary, and no more. Look into the constitutions of all the States, which have been formed since the Federal Constitution, and see if they have not done the same. The Constitution of South Carolina is remarkably explicit and limited on this subject: It says, "that each House may punish by imprisonment, during its sitting, any person not a member, 'who shall be guilty of disrespect to the House, by 'any disorderly or contemptuous behaviour in its 'presence, or who, during the time of its sitting, 'shall threaten harm to the body or estate of any 'member, for anything said in either House; or 'who shall assault any of them therefor; or who 'shall assault or arrest any witness or other person, 'ordered to attend the House, in his going to or returning therefrom; or who shall rescue any person arrested by order of the House." These are all privileges, except privilege from arrest or seizure of estate, mentioned in that constitution; and the slightest inspection at once shows, that except for disrespect or contemptuous conduct, in its presence, or threatening or assaulting a member for his conduct in the House, that no other authority is given to punish—not a word is said about libels, or attacks by writing or printing, on their conduct. It is well known that our Constitution intended the press to be free; to be the means of communicating the acts of the Government, and of commenting on them where necessary; that it supposes that majorities will sometimes exist, who may wish to overstep the boundaries they ought not to pass; and, therefore it provides for them, in the hands of the people, this wholesome correction of the press, which those who resort to must use at their peril. If they use it properly, animadvert with propriety, and really point out defects or usurpations in the Government, the people will applaud their zeal, and the laws will support them in their exertions; but if they falsely or maliciously misrepresent, the law will become the avenger of the Government, and unprejudiced juries be the means of punishing calumniators. This is the true footing upon which legislative privilege should be put in every Government, and it is the one on which it is now placed in the United States. By this you give sufficient power to punish, for any improper thing done in their presence, which may disturb the order of either House, or violate the decorum of their proceedings; and for any supposed slanderous attack, the tenderness with which you ought to touch the Constitutional right of the public to inquire into public affairs, and the delicate subject of trial by jury, will always necessarily oblige you to recur to the latter for redress and satisfaction.

If it was proper, on subjects like this, to refer to British precedents, I could mention a recent one, which is exactly in point; and shows, that even in the English House of Commons, the doctrine I contend for prevails; it is, that in all cases of libels against either House, the remedy must be by prosecution by the Attorney General, and trial by jury. In Stockdale's case, Doctor Logan published charges against the House of Commons, in which he stated, in a variety of ways, that they had been guilty of great cruelty to Mr. Hastings. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, and all sides of the House, agreed that it was a libel; but, instead of ordering him before the House, they entered into resolutions directing the Attorney General to prosecute. It appears to me so clear, that for all libels or attacks on either branch of the Legislature, in writing or in print, the mode must be by prosecution, that I do not know it is necessary to trouble you at this time with any further reasoning on that head; I will therefore only mention one more, and then conclude this part of my subject: it is, that from the nature of our Government, where our President is elective, and obliged to attend to public opinion, even if he wishes to do so, he will never venture on those bold measures, which hereditary Executives sometimes attempt. If, then, there should be some men, whose political talents he is afraid of, or whose inquiries into his administration give him uneasiness, an Executive, instead of venturing on any such measure himself, if he can obtain a majority in either branch, will easily discover some mode of having this man's political inquiries construed into breaches of privilege; and, under cover of his friends' influence, immove and silence, during a whole session, and for half a year, a man, whose arguments were perhaps unanswerable, and whose system may be the one which your councils may the next year adopt. I am far from supposing that we are yet so much advanced in the arts and intrigues of older Governments as to make this probable at present; it is not however impossible, and must be guarded against.

The next question is, that of the liberty of the press, as applying to these defined privileges; and as it is the first time this sacred subject has been before either House on a question of privilege, I shall expect your indulgence in making some remarks on it. I shall be very short; for however fruitful the subject is, yet so much has been said of it elsewhere, and you must be so well acquainted with it, that it will be necessary for me barely to state some general principles, as they apply to the question before you. I feel a pride in saying that in no country has the press ever been as free as in United America; however clouded or interrupted this freedom has, in my opinion, lately been. I entertain a hope that in a few months all its shackles will be removed, and that the emotions they have occasioned in the public mind will for ever forbid its being thus fettered again. To no subject have I ever more carefully applied, than what ought in a well regulated Government to be the freedom of the press. I well know that where the press is not free, liberty is but a name, and Government a mockery. I have therefore endeavored to form, in my own mind, what ought to be the true standard of the freedom of the press with us; and I have no doubt that it consists in this: That the printing press shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the Legislature, or any branch of the Government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof; that the free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the most invaluable rights of man; and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print, on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; that in prosecutions for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers, or men in a public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and in all indictments for libels the Jury shall have a right to determine the law, and the fact, under the direction of the court, as in other cases. This is the situation in which the Constitution of Pennsylvania has placed the press; and it is the true and safe one, upon which it ought to be placed in every free Government. Here the right to investigate the conduct of the Legislature, and of official men, is not only recognised and established, but the Constitution seems to require it as a duty, from the citizens. It says to them, these are men periodically delegated by you to manage your public concerns—to you, and you alone, they are accountable for their conduct; nor can you know whether it is meritorious, or otherwise, but by having the right to examine into it, and by freely and frequently exercising that right. And would it not be the strangest thing in the world, when the Constitution not only establishes the right, but calls upon the citizens to exercise it with alertness, and by no means to neglect it, that if they should happen to displease a branch of the Legislature, whose conduct they have censured, that they should be delivered immediately into the power of this branch, to be dealt with as they please; that the men they had accused, and whom they had, by the Constitution, a right to accuse, should become their judges? Would not this be a most extraordinary doctrine? Would it not involve an inconsistency, that ought not certainly to be chargeable upon the framers of the Constitution? In private cases of slander, or defamation, would you suffer the person abused, or any near connexion of his, or person interested in the event of the suit, to be on the jury? Certainly not. How much more glaringly improper then would it be, in cases of a public nature, where the acts of a legislative branch are censured, and where the charge has been openly and honorably brought forward, to commit the person who produced it, at once, to the power of the body whose acts he has condemned! Let us suppose, that in the exercise of this invaluable right, some disinterested and independent man, urged by the most honorable and patriotic motives, should conceive a branch of the Legislature overstepping the bounds of the Constitution, and going into measures destructive of our rights, or injurious to our interests; that this man should be an important member of your community, of known integrity and independence of situation and character, that he should have no private ends of his own to answer, or anything in view but the public good; that he has embarked in the investigation at the entreaty of a numerous and respectable part of the community, who wished the public mind to be so fairly and fully possessed of facts, and reasonings on them, as to be able, at the next election, to determine with precision and fairness on the conduct of their Legislature; under these circumstances would it be proper to deliver this man into the power of a body whom he has charged with misbehaviour, or a departure from Constitutional principles? Or would it not be more fair, would it not wear more the appearance of impartiality in case an examination was necessary into the nature of his charges, or the manner in which he has made them, and the expressions he has used, to have a distinct and unprejudiced body, a jury acting under oath, to decide between them? As far as I know anything of the principles of natural justice, I should suppose there was no question on the subject, and no other opinion ought to be entertained, and that without it there can be no such liberty of the press, or freedom of inquiry, as the Constitution intends.

And here, sir, let it be asked, why should a Government that means well, or is confident in its uprightness and ability, ever fear the press? It should be to them a source of great pleasure, in reflecting that they had so excellent a mode of diffusing a knowledge of their acts, well knowing, if they were unjustly attacked, it gave them the most ample means of defence; and that if it became immoderate and licentious, the laws were always sufficiently energetic to punish it. How many individuals when attacked or slandered, have rejoiced that such a defence has been afforded them; and how indispensable is its free investigation to the removal of doubts which sometimes crowd about the characters of public bodies, or men, and which it is necessary to remove! Public bodies are public property; and so indeed are public men, who have in any degree rendered themselves conspicuous by their exertions: few of these, if ever there was one, can expect to be without personal enemies; these will be in proportion to the talents of the man they dislike, and his consequence with the people. Men who engage in public life, or are members of legislative bodies, must expect to be exposed to anonymous, and sometimes avowed, attacks, on their principles and opinions. Their best shield will be an upright and able conduct. The best informed will sometimes err; but when their intentions are pure, an enlightened nation will easily discover it, and pardon the mistake. With the shield of conscious rectitude, a Government can never dread the press. It is only in States where the happiness of the people is not the end of Government, or where an individual or a few possess the whole authority, that the press is not agreeable to them. Hence, in despotisms, it is generally odious to the sovereign, and strictly limited. We have, however, found even among them, a latitude which proves that in the most despotic countries, where the sovereign is conscious of using his power for the good of the people, he fears not the slanders of the malicious. It is remarked of Frederic of Prussia, that few princes were more libelled by his subjects; but that in no country were libels more disregarded: that few, if any, instances ever occurred of his endeavoring to discover the authors, or to crush by punishment, the spirit of inquiry which literary pursuits had diffused among his subjects. A more remarkable instance is, that of the Empress of Russia; in giving her directions respecting libels, she says, "great care ought to be taken how we extend this crime; representing to ourselves the danger of debasing the human mind by restraint and oppression, which can produce nothing but ignorance, and must cramp and depress the rising effects of genius." I did not expect to have been obliged ever to have introduced on this floor, Frederic or the Empress, as examples on the subject of the press. The love of liberty, or a wish to countenance the spirit of political inquiry, were not certainly among the reasons for allowing this latitude; but they at once discovered, that if they wished to govern an enlightened people, the spirit of inquiry must be unshackled, and an extensive range given to literary productions. Among the ancients we find Tiberius, and Trajan, and Titus, allowing absolute liberty of speech and writing, suppressing the laws against seditious words and writings, and punishing informers. But the most remarkable instances we have, that freedom of speech and writing are essential to the liberty and greatness of a people, are those of Athens and Rome, when republics: in speaking of them, a celebrated writer says, "that democracy is the nurse of genius, and the greatest encourager of sublimity." The fact is evident from these republics. In Greece, Athens was most democratical, and a state of the greatest liberty; and hence it was, according to Paterculus, "that eloquence flourished in greater force and plenty in that city alone than in all Greece besides; insomuch (says he) although the bodies of the people were dispersed into other cities, yet you would think their souls and their genius to have been pent up within the precincts of Athens." So the city of Rome was not only the seat of liberty and empire, but of true wit and exalted genius. The Roman power outlived, it is true, for a considerable time, its liberty, but the freedom of speech and writing was gone, and wit and genius could not long survive them.

How applicable, sir, are these instances, and how incumbent on us is it, if we mean to keep this country a Republic, to cherish the freedom of the press, to remember that without it seldom any thing great or noble can be produced, that to shackle it is to chain the mind, and stifle the seeds of everything that is generous and amiable! That, in the words of a celebrated divine, "reason and freedom are our own, and given to continue so; we are to use, but cannot resign them, without rebelling against Him who gave them; that to invade them is to encroach on the privileges we receive from God, and traverse the designs of Infinite Goodness." We should remember the danger of precedents, and be careful, as this is the first discussion we have had on this subject, not to establish improper ones, or lay a foundation for that debasement of the mind, which always follows the depression of the press.

It is important here to remind you, of the anxiety of the State Legislatures in insisting upon the doors of the Senate being thrown open, and their legislative proceedings exposed, like the other branch, to public view. It was done unquestionably with the intent, that minutes of your debates should be taken, and all your proceedings subject to the inspection of such of our citizens as choose to attend; but as from the distance, very few of the States could have citizens attending, the great object certainly must have been to have notes taken of the debates, and printed in the gazettes; that through that channel information may be transmitted to every part of the Union, and thus the States become, in the best manner they are able, judges of the talents, as well as conduct and opinions of their members. That this is of infinite importance, in a representative government, no man will deny; but if a printer is to be seized, and dragged to your bar, and perhaps imprisoned for a mistake, that a law has passed when it is only its second reading, or that a member of a committee was not summoned to attend the meeting of the committee, when he was, and did attend, or for any mistake of this kind, I ask you what printer or reporter will take your debates? Who will venture on it; because, where will you draw the line? Will you require that each reporter shall give every word and observation with exactness, and that the smallest deviation from what was said on the orders or proceedings of the House, shall subject him to the odium, and perhaps expense, of a trial at your bar, which must accrue if he has counsel? If this is the case, no reporter will certainly attempt to take your debates, and your doors may just as well be shut again. But, say gentlemen, it is not only for those assertions which you have mentioned, but for the preceding and accompanying observations respecting the views and proceedings of the Senate, and of the members of that body in their official capacity, for which we think this examination requisite. I have already said, in the commencement of my argument, that no man can justify the licentiousness of the press, and that it is perhaps to be lamented that so much invective is used in the papers on both sides of the question; but that as most of these observations are on things that did not happen in the Senate room, and many of them are stated to have occurred near two years ago, and that as much more violent abuse against the Senate was published in the Federal paper styled the Gazette of the United States, on the 13th day of February, and no notice has been taken of it, that it was best, upon this occasion, to suffer the present to pass unnoticed likewise: that it is astonishing the honorable mover from Connecticut, who seems to feel so much for the dignity and character of the Senate on this occasion, did not, on that of the abuse which was heaped on it for consenting to stop the enlistment for the army, have similar feelings; and that as he consented to suffer those animadversions to pass, it would certainly be doing no great violence to his feelings to deal with the present in the same way: that perhaps the best mode to lessen the importance of a paper was, not to treat its observations with either too much notice or severity; that in politics, as in religion, persecution seldom made converts; that if I ever had the inclination to raise the importance of a press, and bring it into celebrity and notice, I would wish it persecuted, for I never saw a press in a free Government persecuted but it rose immediately. Attack a press for its political publications, you instantly convince the people that it is dreaded, and must be of great importance, and attract their attention. We can never forget the memorable cases of Sacheverell and Wilkes, or how much the English nation was agitated by them, and we ought to be convinced, that in every country having the least semblance of freedom, the same consequences will always flow from the same measures.

I request of you again to consider the importance of the question, how far, in the case of libels, or attacks in the papers, for their political opinions, any single branch ought to possess the power, perhaps in a moment of passion and resentment, to decide on what is to affect the personal liberty of a citizen? Whether it is consistent with the nature of our Government, that a single branch, without check or control, should become judges in their own case? Whether any citizen charged with a crime, for which he may be punished by the temporary loss of liberty, is not entitled, by the Constitution, to "a speedy trial by an impartial jury?" And, whether to deny it, in this instance, would not be to interfere with that provision of the Constitution? For my own part, I have no doubt of it; and, feeling as I always do, most jealous of the character of this branch, I am apprehensive, should we proceed in this measure, it may occasion unpleasant observations. Some of its enemies may perhaps say, that no power is so arbitrary as that of the unlimited authority of a single branch, acting in its own cause, revenging its own affronts, and deciding, perhaps more by its own passions and feelings, than by the justice of the case: that a power of this kind, is worse than a despotism; because there the despot is in some measure checked by his individual responsibility; for the act being the official act of the body, is that sort of protection under which an individual despot cannot shelter himself from the public odium—should the measure be oppressive, he must alone meet the general censure, which thus centered, strikes with force; but when divided among a number, must in a great measure lose its effect. That, in every view of the subject, we must be convinced that for libels, or printed attacks, on either branch, the Constitution must have intended to give the person charged the right of trial by a jury, so collected that a cool and unprejudiced examination might take place, and justice be done to all parties; that this I had shewn to be the case, in the instance I had mentioned, in the House of Commons of Great Britain; and we surely would not wish the press should be more free, or the freedom of inquiry into legislative conduct more unshackled in England than with us. Look sir, into the abuse that is daily poured by the papers of that country, upon their Parliament and Administration, and upon Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, and all their leading members; and yet we see no proceedings of this kind. Indeed if we were to believe Montesquieu, and the writers since him, it is to the freedom of the press alone, England owes the portion of liberty she enjoys—it is the ladder by which she rose, and that which she will struggle most to preserve. I devoutly hope she will always keep it, and that we shall likewise maintain it for ever in its utmost purity.

If we proceed in this business to the length it may go, that is, to issue the warrant to apprehend and confine, where, sir, is the power given to this branch to issue the warrant, and to appoint an officer to execute it; and in case he is unable to do so, to order the civil officers of the United States to aid him? I see no such power, nor do I believe any such is to be found in the Constitution. But may not another difficulty arise, and that is, if the editor is apprehended, and applies to a Judge, either of the United States, or the State in which you sit, for a habeas corpus, to examine into the nature of the commitment, and the Judge should be of opinion that you have no right to commit for such an offence, and that your remedy must be by prosecution, and discharge the editor, what then is to be done? Will you commit the Judge for doing his duty, and deciding according to the Constitution, and his oath to preserve it? And if a State Judge should discharge him, and the State should be of opinion their Judge had done his duty, and ought to be supported in it, will you suppose the present publication sufficiently important to give rise to a conflict of jarring opinions between the United States and the State, and to disturb the harmony which at present so happily prevails? If one or two of their Judges may have held an opinion in England, that a Judge cannot discharge on a habeas corpus a man, however improperly committed, on a charge of breach of privilege, the solemn opinion of the British House of Lords, delivered in the famous case of Ashby and White, goes unquestionably to fix the point, that a Judge can discharge on a habeas corpus, any man illegally or improperly committed, although by either branch of Parliament.

Upon the whole of this question, which I consider as extremely important to the liberties of our common country, I am to entreat that the House will well consider every step before they proceed. To adopt the motion before you, is to pledge the House to proceed in a business of great difficulty, and to give a wound to the freedom of the press which it may not easily recover. Remember, sir, it is a blessing guaranteed to your whole nation by the Constitution; and that if a few men should at any time be so imprudent as to injure the cause they wish to abet, that ought never to be a reason for depriving a whole people of their dearest right—a right without which, in its full, unshackled, and Constitutional sense, I repeat, that liberty is but a name, and Government a mockery; that the press is to a free people, the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; that it is the only mode through which truth can be conveyed to magistrates and rulers, who will frequently find things written, that their friends did not dare to advise them. I trust that before we proceed to the extremities I apprehend, that all means of gentleness will be first tried. Terror can always be applied to, but never without danger; for if it fails once, it produces disrespect ever after.

I have endeavored to give these subjects the deliberate examination they appeared to me to require; nor can any much more important to your citizens, be agitated within these walls. They not only include the privileges of Congress, and the freedom of the press—questions of very great consequence in themselves—but the all-important one of the extent of the right of trial by jury, possessed by your citizens, in the case of written or printed observations on the conduct of the Legislature, or any branch of it, and the Constitutional right they have to make such observations. Their magnitude will, I hope, easily excuse me for the time I have taken. It was to guard the privileges of our citizens, and to secure the great palladium of our liberties, the freedom of the press, that I have made these remarks. The Constitution has declared, that its freedom shall not be abridged; and that it shall not, it is our duty to take care that no question respecting it shall ever be determined without the intervention of a jury. It is difficult perhaps, in preserving its privileges, to guard against its licentiousness; but it is infinitely better that some instances of this sort should arise, than that a particle of its freedom should be lost. Considering, as I always have done, the freedom of the press as amongst the greatest of our public blessings, while I almost adore its good qualities, I am content to throw a veil over its defects. Few men have been for some time, attacked in the papers with more acrimony than myself; but as I know it is impossible to touch the freedom of the press without destroying it, and as I believe it to be the only true means of preserving rational liberty in the world, I trust that our country, which has received such important benefits from its operations, will never cease to cherish and protect it. I hope it will be our boast, as I know it will be our interest, while other nations are endeavoring to fetter and destroy, to guard it as a sacred trust received from our ancestors, and to deliver it, with its rights undiminished, to those who are to succeed us.

For these reasons I am decidedly opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut; and move such an amendment, as will record my opinion on this subject, on the Journals.

Mr. P. here read the following:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States has expressly declared 'That the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;' and whereas, to prevent any attempt being made on the part of either branch of Congress to define their own privileges, and exercise the same as occasion or circumstances may, in their opinion, require, and to remove all doubt as to the extent and exercise of the privileges they are to enjoy, the Constitution has positively and expressly limited and defined the same, by declaring that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members; that they may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each House may provide; that they may determine the rules of their proceedings, punish the members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member; that the members of both Houses shall in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the attendance at their session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and for any debate or speech in either House, shall not be questioned in any other place:

"Therefore, resolved, That as the Constitution of the United States does not vest in either branch of Congress any other powers on the subject of privilege than those mentioned and limited and defined therein, therefore to assume any other privilege would be to diminish the rights of the people, expressly reserved to them by the Constitution; to encroach on the powers given to the judiciary; to disparage the right of trial by jury, and to establish the dangerous doctrine that a single branch, without control or interference, can at their own will, and in their own case, punish for reasons on which the Constitution has given to them no power to decide."

Mr. P. concluded by adding, that if the Senate went into a consideration of his motion, instead of that of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TRACY,) they would probably avoid that part of the discussion which would be least agreeable, as the subject would be clear from that locality and personality which attached to the first, and a decision would take place without any reference to this or that particular printer; but if the gentleman would postpone the question, Mr. P. consented to let his motion lie on the table, with a view to its being printed for the use of the members, that so both propositions might be compared and considered with more attention than could be done in any other way.

Mr. COCKE declared that the object which he had in view was nothing more nor less than to rid the House of the business altogether. He was not inclined to appoint any special time for the discussion, as the worthy gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PINCKNEY) had requested. He had no idea that it was supposed he had the saving or exonerating of any printer in view; he had no such thing; but he wished to save the reputation of this body, which he thought was placed in jeopardy by the Connecticut motion. Here it is proposed to inquire and examine of and into, this, that, and the other—to bring one printer here, and generally all persons and papers, who and whatever, just as your committee may think fit. Suppose this power is doubted? Suppose the persons deny your power—how are your committee to enforce their mandates? Suppose your courts of law claim cognizance as a case of libel, are you to have two prosecutions and two trials for the same offence? Surely, surely, your committee will have to retire from the untenable ground, and the defeat will recoil with disgrace upon those of us who attempt to assume powers neither Constitutional in themselves, nor just, even if they were Constitutional. You can call upon somebody—but who?—to inquire who is the editor of the Aurora. You are to inquire how he became possessed of a certain bill which he published; what kind of an inquiry is this? How he procured the sight of a bill, while it was pending in Senate. Why, is there any crime in printing a minute of our transactions? Your bills are printed by your own order, for your use, and for the information of the other House; two hundred copies or more are circulated without any injunction of secrecy; they are sent off into every State of the Union; and are you going to make inquiry how the editor of the Aurora got to see one of them? Why, are not your gallery doors open, and cannot a bill which has been read in public be possibly remembered, at least, cannot it be taken down in short-hand? and will you punish every man who shall repeat, print, or publish what is made public on this floor? Suppose the editor of the Aurora declines to inform your committee of the mode through which he obtains his information; he says it is convenient and useful to him, but his prior engagements do not permit him to divulge it to you; will you punish him for contempt? But suppose you possessed of the physical power necessary to procure the information you require by an application of the torture; while you are straining his muscles and dislocating his joints, what becomes of the grand palladium of American freedom? Where is the liberty of the press, which is secured to the citizens of the Union against Federal usurpation? The Constitution declares that you shall not infringe upon the liberty of the press; and a power expressly denied to the whole Government, a single branch may not assume.

Here Mr. C., was called to order by Mr. BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania, who inquired what the liberty of the press had to do on a question of postponement? He believed, while the motion for postponement was under consideration, all debate on the merits of the main question to be out of order.

It was contended to be in order to object on a postponement generally to the original motion, for an argument tending to defeat the original motion is reason for a general postponement.

Mr. COCKE proceeded, and said he was glad to find that the freedom of debate in this House was not to be destroyed, though it might be interrupted; and he hoped that the freedom of the press would never be subverted while the Government of the country rested upon the Republican principle of representation. He admitted there were a great many ill-natured things said by many of our American presses, but that should never induce him to run the risk of destroying the most valuable and effectual bulwark for maintaining us free and independent, by using an instrument more fit to cut down the trunk of a tree, than to prune it of its tendril luxuriations. What was the engine now brought out against this freedom—an engine possessed of all the powers, necessary to insure its success? A printer is to be charged, is to be tried, judged of, and executed, by a body he has offended. Where, will you find men of nerve that will risk certain ruin? Such may arise when the press is in danger. It was under these impressions that he wished to get rid of the business altogether.

Mr. TRACY, of Connecticut, did not wish to press the business; indeed his conduct had manifested this intention, for the original motion had been suffered to lie on the table a longer term than usual before it was called up, but even now when it was called up he did not wish to hurry it through. He should not refuse a moderate delay, but he hoped the motion from Tennessee would not prevail, as it went to destroy the object without any further consideration. In answer to what fell from the gentleman from Tennessee, he would say, that the objections he had made did not all of them apply, and if there was any which did apply, amendments could be made so as to conform them to the sense of the Senate. He wished gentlemen would attend to the words of the resolution, and they would find that they did not carry them beyond what was prudent, mild, and proper. The committee are desired to inquire who is the editor of the Aurora; this will appear to be a proper inquiry, for the person is not publicly known: the imprint declares the paper to be published for the heirs of Benjamin Franklin Bache, but we do not know who are the heirs. The gentleman has told us it is no crime to publish the doings of this body; agreed, but is it nothing to publish untruths respecting the official conduct of the members of this body? is it no crime to publish a bill while before this House? But are printers at liberty to tell lies about our transactions? The Aurora says, that the bill which it published had passed the Senate; this every member knows to be contrary to the fact. The bill has not even to the present moment passed this body, it is still on your table liable to recommitment, amendment, or rejection. Asking the editor how he came to print this falsehood, does not go to examine into the private mode by which conveyance of intelligence is made to that office; there can be no real intelligence, it being a falsehood. But suppose we have no power over this editor, because the press is free, suppose we cannot punish him for his slander, calumny, and falsehood, perhaps the inquiry may lead us to discover some person whom we can punish; will it be said that the Constitution is an impediment in our way to punish one of our own members, if he should be found guilty of abusing the confidence of his situation? At least we can exercise the power of removing one of our officers, if we should convict him of a secret league to transmit intelligence which is confidentially entrusted to his care.

He did not mean to insinuate that any improper mode was used in conveying this intelligence; it might appear that the whole circumstance was a mere unintentional error, if so he should not go farther; but yet the printer could hardly have made the subsequent mistake in relation to the gentleman from South Carolina, in declaring that he had never been consulted by the committee on Mr. Ross's bill; there was something in this calculated to produce an effect upon the public mind. He insinuates that the business of the Senate is done in caucuses, into which the gentleman was not permitted to enter; for if he had, it is supposed he might have detected and defeated the mischiefs which are working against the public welfare. This is an abandoned slander, as is well known to every member of the House, for Mr. PINCKNEY did attend not one meeting only, as the editor of the Aurora squeezed out some days subsequent to his first licentious publication, but he did attend every meeting, as he has candidly and honorably avowed in his place.

The gentlemen had declared themselves the champions of the press; but surely gentlemen will not advocate such liberty as this—the liberty of publishing nothing but lies and falsehood. If by the liberty of the press is meant the publication of truth and just political information, it was proper to be supported; but he was desirous of maintaining, along with the liberty of the press, the liberty of the citizens, and the security of the Government; he was not for sacrificing these latter objects to the licentiousness of the press. He was not inclined to enter into a newspaper controversy to maintain the dignity and reputation of the Senate, nor did he think that gentlemen appreciated their own standing in society when they referred the individual members of this body to such a mode of defence against the shafts of calumny which a daring editor might hurl against them individually.

He believed that it was as requisite to maintain the privileges of the Senate as it was to support the liberty of the press; the Constitution secured the first as well as the last; and it became important in considering the subject in this point to ascertain the extent of the privilege on the present occasion. The Constitution declares several privileges to belong to the members of Congress, and these privileges are given in order to secure the execution of the public duties which are enjoined upon us; it is for the interest of the people, and not for our own peculiar advantage, that we enjoy these privileges, it is then proper that we should on their account maintain them; but, in defining what may be privilege, we must govern ourselves according to the original intention, which is the promotion of the general interests of the citizens, and here we can be guided only by sound discretion and common sense. In this point of view the subject becomes truly important. Will any gentleman contend that our privileges are restrained to this Chamber? No. Are there no other methods by which our deliberations may be interrupted? Certainly there are. Of course, then, our authority must extend to remedy the evil wherever we may meet it, or otherwise our authority is inadequate to protect itself. On the principle of self-preservation, which results to every public body of necessity and from the nature of the case, the right of self-preservation is vested in the Senate of the United States, as it is in your courts of justice and other public institutions. Suppose a printer was to say that one of the judges had received a bribe in a certain case, would not the court be competent to call him before them and punish him for the slander, if it was one? And shall a printer insinuate that members of this body are guilty of a similar crime, and they have no mode of giving redress? Is it not of as much importance that the laws be dictated from pure motives, as that they be executed from pure motives? If it is admitted that we have the right of protecting ourselves within these walls, from attacks made on us in our presence, it follows of course that we are not to be slandered and questioned elsewhere. Will gentlemen deny this? then there is no complete remedy; for the defamation and calumny of yesterday, circulated in the newspapers, out-travel the slow and tardy steps of truth; they have spread over the face of the country and entered every cottage, where the contradiction may never penetrate. Or shall the foul aspersions of an editor circulate till you can send to the attorney general to issue a writ, to the marshal to serve it, to the court and jury to bring it, before the contradiction can be published? This also would defeat the object. The Senate, being so long suspected, must have received a deep wound, and some of its members may have to be amputated before a right understanding is acquired.

Mr. T. concluded with reiterating the idea that he did not mean to punish for publishing the transactions which took place in Senate, but to prevent misrepresentation and abuse; he did not wish the punishment to be cruel or severe, but as mild and lenient as the case would admit.

Mr. BLOODWORTH, of North Carolina, doubted the power of the Senate to take cognizance of the conduct of members in communicating with their constituents, much less to punish them for publishing circumstances respecting which no injunction of secrecy had been imposed. He, however, assured the Senate that he had not given the editor of the Aurora any information on the subject before them, or indeed on any other, for the editor was a stranger to him; nor did he know that he ever called at that printing office more than once or twice in his life. He hoped that the business would be postponed for the present, and he should have no objection to its being taken up at a future day, when gentlemen might be better prepared to meet it.

Mr. PAINE, of Vermont, declared himself against the postponement, nor did he think that the motion of Mr. PINCKNEY was so inconsistent with the motion before the House as to render a postponement necessary; he thought the committee might inquire, and although the gentleman would stop, by his proposition, from proceeding in case it turned out to be a fabrication of the editor of the Aurora, yet if it should be found not a fabrication of his, but that of a member or an officer of the House, it was admitted they might progress, without infringing the sacred liberty of the press. Suppose that some person in the gallery should have furnished this spurious matter—and that may possibly be the case—will the sacred liberty of the press be violated if we order the doorkeeper to turn him out, and refuse him access in future? He thought the resolutions might be amended so as to give greater satisfaction than they do at present; for his own part he was not willing to declare all at present which they contained. He thought the business would be simplified if the committee were directed to consider and report what measures would be proper to adopt in respect to a publication containing various untruths of the proceedings of the Senate, and if the question of postponement was lost he meant to move several amendments for that purpose.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, had no objection to meet the question at the present moment, but he thought it of such importance, both to the Senate and the citizens of the United States, that it should be taken up and discussed in a solemn and serious manner; not hastily and lightly, as some gentlemen seemed to think who were opposed to the postponement for a few days: if, however, the opposition to the postponement was persisted in, he had no doubt but the subject would prove itself well worth a discussion of several days, and that the ultimate decision would not be made till a period more remote than that moved for by his friend from South Carolina. He therefore recommended to gentlemen to explore well the ground which the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut had taken, and consider seriously of the consequences to which they would be led in pursuing their object. What was to be the course of their proceeding? What were the embarrassments likely to arise therein?

SENATE.

He called the House to view the delicacy of the situation in which they would be involved while defining their newly discovered privileges and subverting the old acknowledged privileges of the liberty of the press; he said the delicacy of their situation, because he considered it a delicate one, for he was far from believing that the privileges of the Senate were as unlimited as the gentleman from Connecticut contended they were; if so, and they proceed to touch the liberty of the press, which they may discover in the end to be secured against the invasion, they will be compelled to retrace every step they are now taking, which will neither redound to their honor nor discernment. They should be careful how they expose themselves to popular scrutiny in cases respecting their own power, for the public mind had been already considerably agitated, at what many conceived to be an unconstitutional exercise of power. If, session after session, attempts were made to fetter the freedom of the press, the people of the United States would watch with anxious regard every movement of this body. A measure which originated in the Senate, and was subsequently acceded to by the other branch of the Legislature, had been just ground of alarm. It is no wonder that they watch our bills as well as our laws, for it must be recollected by many of the gentlemen who hear me, that the bill called the Sedition Bill was first introduced here, and that, instead of being what it afterwards became, it was a bill more particularly to define treason and sedition. The good sense of the House, during the time it was upon the table and undergoing a political dissection, cut off from it many of those monstrous excrescences which at first disfigured it, and at last trimmed it into a shapely form; but after all it was removed below stairs in a condition not fit to meet the eye of our constituents—even obliged to undergo a decapitation; the head or the title of it was struck off, and instead of being a bill defining treason—which is a thing totally out of our power, the Constitution having declared in what alone treason should consist—instead of being denominated a bill against sedition, it took the obnoxious head of being a bill to amend the law for punishing certain crimes against the United States.

Nor, said Mr. M., do I think gentlemen do themselves much honor in the declarations they make on this floor, respecting the publication of the bill for deciding the disputes in the election of a President and Vice President; they seem to consider the publication of such a bill with a declaration of its having passed the Senate as a scandal on the Senate. Well, it might perhaps be a subject of scandal as to the Senate, if they had passed it; but is not this charging the committee who reported it, with reporting a bill which it would be a scandal perhaps to advocate but certainly a scandal to pass? According to this construction of the argument, the gentlemen certainly cast as gross a censure upon the committee who reported a bill which is unfit to be acted upon, as the publication is supposed to cast on the House for having agreed to it. With respect to the measures which are pursued and pursuing, is it unknown to the members on this floor what effects they are producing; do they not know that the sedition bill as it is called, and which the present motion may be considered as supplementary to, has created a general alarm not only among our citizens, but in several of our State Legislatures? Will not this measure increase that alarm? Or is it supposed that you may call upon a printer and that he will answer, not knowing that by the Constitution no man can be called upon to give evidence against himself in criminal cases? He concluded with the remark that he did not mean to go into the subject fully, because the question before the House was confined to the postponement; but, if the postponement was refused, he should take the liberty of adding some further observations to enforce the ideas contained in the motion brought forward by his worthy friend from South Carolina.

Mr. COCKE wished that gentlemen who were of the same sentiments with himself would acquiesce in his motion for throwing out the subject at once, so that they might hear no more of it. He was well convinced that the House had no powers to legislate in relation to publications in newspapers, notwithstanding all that the gentleman from Connecticut had said. It had been asked where the Senate had got the power, and it is replied, they got it by a necessary and natural inference from the Constitution. This idea of drawing powers by inference and construction had been stretched, on former occasions, much beyond what he considered a proper attention to its spirit would justify; but the doctrine on this point could not be inferred from that instrument, because the argument by inference is rebutted by the express declaration made in the amendments to the Constitution, wherein it is declared that all the powers which are not given to the United States are reserved either to the States or to the people; and again, it declares that every man shall be secured in his person and papers from unlawful searches and seizures; and further, no person shall be called upon in a criminal case to give testimony against himself.

He supposed the resolutions considered the publications in the Aurora as criminal, otherwise they would not make this stir about them. Gentlemen have asked, are the newspapers to be permitted to go on and villify the members of the Legislature without punishment? He answered, the printers of papers published on their own responsibility, and if they had no authority for any scandalous assertions respecting the Senate, they could be punished in the way pointed out by law. But would the members wish to draw the printers before the House and assume the judiciary powers of the courts of justice? As they had not the advantage of grand juries from every vicinage, to present the libels as they arise in the various quarters of the Union, they would be forced to appoint another committee to remark the files of all the printers from Maine to Georgia, in order to procure a knowledge of the numerous calumnies and slanders on the Senate, which have been fabricated by them, or communicated by their friends. He thought this a business of considerable extent, and one which few gentlemen on the floor would be willing to labor through; he thought, moreover, when they erected themselves into Censors of the Press they would find no leisure from their office to attend to the performance of their ordinary duties of legislation or that portion of Executive business which the Constitution assigned to their care. He was confident it would give more general satisfaction to their immediate constituents, the State Legislatures, if members would attend to the business they were sent here to perform, than would be given by combining all powers of Government in their own body. It would certainly redound more to the honor of the Senate, if they left the courts to perform their duties in cases of libel, than to undertake, in their own behalf, the ungrateful office of judge and the ungraceful one of executioner; and all this either without law or by a resolution tantamount to an ex post facto law, directly in the face of the Constitution, which restricts Congress from passing an ex post facto law in all cases whatsoever.

SENATE.

Breach of Privilege.

MR. ANDERSON, of Tennessee, did not rise with an intention of entering into the merits of the general question, as to the extent of the privileges of the Senate, which he conceived to be of great moment, but merely to remark, as gentlemen alleged that the public mind was already agitated on the subject, the postponement would tend to increase the degree of agitation, which he conceived it was the wish of gentlemen on both sides to have allayed as soon as possible. He therefore concluded that it would be better to go on with the business and come as soon as possible to a decision. One gentleman had said it ought to go to the judicial courts, and that the Attorney General should be directed to prosecute: well, then, that gentleman should give his consent to send the business to a committee, in order to inquire whether the case would warrant this interference.

MR. REED, of South Carolina, would not oppose the motion of his honorable colleague for a postponement, if he had required it on his own account, or if its being negative would prevent him from bringing forward the preamble and resolution he had read in his place, and at a proper time of having them discussed; but neither of these circumstances were urged; therefore, as his colleague neither required time for preparation nor would be prevented from offering and supporting the intended amendment, he should vote against the postponement.

MR. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, supposed if the postponement was lost, that the House would proceed with the discussion on the Connecticut motion, which he conceived would be progressing in an unnatural mode towards a decision. As he firmly believed that the privileges of the Senate were limited and defined by the Constitution, he could not resist calling the House in the first place to consider of and decide this question. He had heard arguments which he imagined would satisfy them of the justness of the conclusions he had drawn, and which would demonstrate that the privileges of the members did not go out of the doors of their Chamber; and that this was not only the actual ground on which they stood, but it was the proper, the dignified, and manly attitude for them to take. Every gentleman should be the guardian of his own honor; and here he would just remark, that, from the style and manner used in the Connecticut motion, it was to be expected that in general the idea would be entertained that this procedure took its rise from an application made to the House either by himself or some of his friends, as he was the only member named; and the committee are directed to inquire by what authority the editor published in the Aurora that he (Mr. P.) had never been consulted. Far be it from him to ask the protection of the House for any publication respecting himself; though few persons in the United States had been more abused or calumniated than himself in the modern newspapers, he had never complained; he either despised the abuse, or answered the charges, which served to draw down contempt upon the slanderer's head; and this was the line of conduct which he recommended to others, who should find themselves in a similar situation. He trusted after what he had formerly declared, that he never gave or sent the editor of the Aurora either the bill which he published of any of the information accompanying it, that it would be unnecessary for him to declare anything further. He had said that he was prepared to go into the discussion, but his indisposition would scarcely permit him to do the subject the justice which its merits deserved, and he therefore still hoped the motion for postponement till Tuesday next would be agreed to.

MR. DAYTON had the highest confidence in the honor of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PINCKNEY,) and he never suffered himself to doubt of the truth of the declaration which had been made. He thought the resolutions might be varied so as to get rid of the idea which the gentleman objected to, in respect to the motion having been brought forward at his instance; and might be amended as suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. PAINE,) so as to reconcile it still more to the sentiments of the Senate. This being his view of the subject, he wished the business to proceed, and should therefore vote against the postponement.

The question on postponing till Tuesday next, was now put, and the yeas and nays being called, stood yeas 9, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Gunn, Hillhouse, Laurence, Livermore, Lloyd, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson and Wells.

So the motion was lost.

MR. NICHOLAS, of Virginia, wished to ask for information. Was it intended by this resolution to charge the committee with inquiring into a breach of privilege as it respected the majority of this body? For the resolution itself furnished no correct idea on this point. He wished also to know whether it was intended that the Senate should declare that the publication was a breach of privilege?

Mr. TRACY, of Connecticut, said that if the gentleman wished for information from him, he would endeavor to give it. He conceived it would be better to pursue the mode of inquiry in the first instance, through the intervention of a committee, and not make at once a decision whether the publication was or was not a breach of privilege; and further, that the committee should report to the Senate what other matters were the proper subjects for the Senate's inquiry. He would not undertake to say at this time whether there was a breach of privilege at all, or whether that breach was in respect to a majority of the House, or of the privilege of a single member.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, was of opinion that if the subject itself was a proper one to be inquired into, then the mode was well devised, and one liable to few or no objections; but there was another circumstance to which he begged permission to call the attention of the Senate. He observed that the resolution pointed only to one object, and that was the publications in the Aurora; he did not think this went far enough, if it was intended to be anything more than a party manoeuvre. If gentlemen meant to defend the honor of this body, they should avoid anything like partiality, and direct their inquiry to all breaches of privilege, by publications in newspapers, let their publishers be whom they might. Believing that the gentlemen were serious in the present undertaking, he wished them to give it the appearance of impartiality, without which, it would reflect disgrace on their proceedings. Gentlemen have complained of the slander and calumny thrown upon them by the publications in the Aurora, but, however detestable they might be, he held in his hand one still more vile and flagrant. He would read it, and then move to amend the resolution before the House by adding that the committee be directed to inquire who is the editor of the United States Gazette, and by what authority he published in that paper the following paragraphs:

"The Democrats have at length completely carried their point with respect to the permanent army. It was resolved on Monday, in the Senate, that the bill, sent up from the House of Representatives, suspending the enlistments, should pass into a law; and no other reliance is now left us for the preservation of this bulwark of the public hope, from the effects of so ruinous a step, but the courage of his Excellency the President of the United States.

The votes in the Senate on this momentous question, were as follows:

For putting a stop to the enlistments: Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Foster, Franklin, Langdon, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

Also Messrs. Bingham, Dexter, Goodhue, Greene, Gunn, Hillhouse, Howard, Livermore, and Paine.

Gentlemen who voted for preserving the army according to the law by which it was established—Messrs. Chipman, Latimer, Laurance, Lloyd, Read, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

Impressed as we are with the most serious alarms at the manifest tendencies of this dreadful step, we cannot for a moment allow ourselves to doubt, that the measure will be nipped in the bud by the decided negative of the Executive. Never can there be an occasion more imperiously demanding that negative than the present. The President has expressly declared to both Houses of Congress, that a steady perseverance in a system of national defence is indispensable to our peace and safety. An advance therefore, on the part of Congress, towards impairing the grounds on which his administration rests, and on which his particular measures are bottomed, can only be met on his part, by opposing a firm countenance to such attempts at the outset, or by recalling the steps themselves.

The measure just adopted is more awful, I think, in whatever aspect viewed, than that proposed by the honorable member from Virginia. In the first place, as it was carried by federal votes; by gentlemen, who, under the influence of I know not what wretched calculations, advance into what they deem a neutral region, to embrace the enemy: This neutral country is full of concealed snares, and gins, and pitfalls: every step of it is mined, and fraught with devices for their destruction. They have been blown from it into the air more than fifty times, and yet they advance upon it again, with the most sovereign unconcern. In the second place, from the excess of evil there often arises some important good—their extremes do often meet. From this benefit these gentlemen have most kindly cut us off; and by the half measures they have adopted, left us exposed to all the mischiefs which could have resulted from the prevalence of the motion of Mr. Nicholas. Thirdly, the measure of stopping the recruiting service is worse than that of disbanding the army; because nearly all the expense still continues, while all the beneficial effect of that expense is perverted to our injury. A monarch without subjects, a general without an army, and an officer without soldiers, are standing butts of the jest and ridicule of all mankind; and a surer mode could hardly have been devised for disgusting every military man in the country than this of depriving the officers of their troops, thereby making each of them a pompous effigy of dignity, a nomen et præterea nihil. These officers will not mutiny against their Government, because they are amongst the most respectable and patriotic of men. It is my pride to boast an acquaintance with many of them, who have laid aside professions which supported them in the rank of gentlemen, and with others who relinquished every luxury and enjoyment of affluence, to join this army, this phalanx of federalism, these cohorts of justice and honor, against the infidel, rapacious, and sanguinary invaders of our rights, and their atrocious and unprincipled sectaries. I know they will not mutiny; but if it had been sought to devise a scheme to drive men to the extremest excess of disgust, I know not a more plausible one than this.

The resolution proposed by Mr. Randolph ought now in all reason to be adopted. It is necessary in order to render this measure consistent with reason or common sense. The whole force of the mighty Twelve Regiments is then cut down to about three thousand men! Precious defence against the invasion of a foreign enemy, or the machinations of domestic treason! Why, McKean will turn out more than this number of well-armed well-organized militia-men from the city and county of Philadelphia alone. I do not think that the movements of that powerful Triumvirate, Jefferson, McKean, and Monroe, are by any means to be despised or disregarded. It is no longer a doubt that our unhappy country nourishes in her bosom vipers who live but in the hope of inflicting a mortal sting. There is not a doubt, that there are men in America, and men too of powerful and operative force, who would prostrate without remorse every pillar of the public happiness, to found an hierarchy under which they might more securely aggrandize themselves; I do not less doubt that these Capulets are abroad, that their hot blood is up and stirring towards this object. And is this a time for disbanding troops? Is there not extant a danger to be guarded against quo-cunque modo? But there seems to be a system for repressing in the Federal cause all spirit worthy of the part which it is called to act. Sure never till now, were the counsels of Adonis relied on in affairs of State. When the reins of the steeds and the chariot of the Sun were entrusted to the guidance of Phœton, we read that the car was overthrown, and the presumptuous youth submerged in the waves.

True Americans will say, it is a vexatious suit that this man urges, when the truth is, that I have only to say vestra res agitur. They will exclaim, whence this abuse and illiberality against an economical and a conciliatory measure? It was by this cursed economy that the villain Neckar brought his monarch into all his troubles; and it was by conciliatory measures that the unhappy prince lost his head.

If the economy, and the squeamishness, and the present conciliatory disposition of Federalism endure much longer, its empire will pass away like a dream, or the shadows of illumination; no figure will encompass it around; and its economy, and its conscientiousness, and its conciliation, and all its bitter delusions, will be atoned in one truly republican succession of fire and blood.

The abuse of True Americans, half federalists, and conciliation men, I have long learnt to despise. I feel inexpressible and uncontrollable chagrin and indignation when I see measures pursued, under whatever calculations, so evidently tending to the ruin and subversion of the order and peace of this society, and so utterly militant against all usage and experience. Not having any gold to hug, like the poor, rich True Americans, and time-serving federalists and conciliators, I have no other object so near me as the success and prosperity of my much abused, sadly distressed country; and I will protest alike against the undivulged pretence of treasonous malice, and the more fatal cowardice and ignorance of the enemies to every establishment by which, in this day of distress and tribulation, the great ark of our safety might be preserved and maintained.

I will dwell but for a moment on the hope that the President will interpose his veto between this alarming measure and its consequences, and then quit a subject on which there will be nothing more to say.

The preservation of harmony between the different branches of the Government is undoubtedly desirable; at the same time when an important prerogative is entrusted to either department, and the exercise of that prerogative is demanded by motives of public safety, no considerations of this or any other nature ought to prevent the exertion of it. Nor do the reproaches of evil-minded men on such occasions, merit the slightest regard. It is true that the newly enlightened citizens of France murdered their royal master on this pretence; but the people of America, however debauched by the introduction of the profligate principles of that hideous race, are not yet degenerated to so high a pitch of perfectibility, civilization, and refinement. In this one respect, at least, they are not yet the freest and most enlightened nation on earth. I think that whoever attentively considers the late events in France, will view that Republic as a more formidable enemy to America than ever—formidable in enmity, in fallacious peace still more so: Gallis fidem non habendum. Talleyrand, who was turned out of office by the old Government, for demanding tributes and bribes of our Ministers, we behold reinstated in his former office by the new governors! And for what particular merit more probably, than for his care over the strong box of the Republic, to which Bonaparte appears to have a very single eye! With this polluted, ill-omened Apostolus Diaboli our mission must treat, if they be at all allowed to treat, which I deem very questionable.

Are these the auspices on which we are to rely for peace: is this the crisis at which our wisdom disbands the only army the country has to boast of?"

[NOTE.—The above comprises all of the debate on this subject which the Compiler has been able to recover. The explanatory remarks* by the Reporter for the "Aurora," will probably account for the meagerness of the report.]

It was then moved to amend the motion, by inserting, between the words "Senate" and the word "and," in the fourth line from the end, these words:

"And that the said committee be also directed to inquire who is the editor of the newspaper, printed in said city, called the 'Gazette of the United States and Philadelphia Daily Advertiser,' and by what means the said editor became possessed of the votes in the Senate on the bill, sent from the House of Representatives, for suspending the enlistments of the twelve regiments, &c., as published in the said newspaper, bearing date the 13th of February (instant;) and by what authority he published those votes particularly, and under the classification contained in the said newspaper; and, also, whether the said editor is the author, or not, and if not, who is the author of sundry assertions, observations, and reflections, immediately preceding and following the statement of the said votes, and published in the said paper, of, and concerning the Senate of the United States, and the members thereof, in their official capacity."

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Lloyd, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Greene, Gunn, Hillhouse, Laurance, Livermore, Paine Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

THE JUDICIARY.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. PINCKNEY had leave to bring in a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts

* We are fortunately enabled to give a sketch of the proceedings in the Senate of the United States on Mr. Tracy's resolution, respecting a publication in the Aurora of the 19th ult., a subject involving in it not only the privilege of members of Congress, but determining the liberty of the press, in a more decisive manner than either the Sedition law of the last Congress, or the judicial decision of the Chief Justice, that the common law of England exists in all its force under our Federal Constitution. We are sorry that our report is confined to a mere sketch, because the subject requires the fullest display, but the extreme inconvenience of the scanty gallery, which was crowded, in an uncommon manner, prevented us from hearing in some cases with the accuracy we wished, and limited our notes; we however trust that enough will be detailed to give a general idea of the motives, intentions and objects by which the members were respectively guided and influenced.—Reporter for the Aurora.

MARCH, 1800.

The Judiciary.

SENATE.

of the United States;" which was read and ordered to the second reading.

On introducing the above bill Mr. PINCKNEY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: When I first had the honor of addressing you on this subject it appeared to me necessary to move an amendment to the Constitution; on reflection, however, I am since convinced that the more regular and expeditious mode would be to move an amendment to the law establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States—by this means the law may be passed during the present session, and we shall the more readily obtain the limitation we contend for.

As the Judiciary is among the most important departments in our Government, as it reaches every situation in society—neither the rich, the honored, or the humble, being without its influence or above its control—as it is the department to which not only the lives and fortunes, but the characters of our citizens are peculiarly entrusted, it becomes us to be extremely careful that the Judges should not only be able and honest men, but independent in their situation. Our Constitution has in some degree secured their independence by giving them permanent salaries, and rendering them ineligible to the Legislature; but in vain will we consider them independent, in vain may we suppose their opinion beyond the control or interference of the Executive, until we have determined it shall not be in his power to give them additional offices and emoluments, while Judges; until, in short, we confine them wholly to their duties as Judges, and teach them to believe that in the execution of the laws they should consider themselves as little obliged to please the President, or to fear his disapprobation, as that of any other man in the Government. This can only be done by preventing them accepting other offices, while they continue as Judges, and thus depriving him of the power of heaping upon them additional favors and emoluments.

It is an established maxim, and I hope will forever remain so, that the Legislature and Judiciary should be as distinct as the nature of our Government will admit; that is, that the same men shall not, in a deliberative capacity, agree to measures which they shall afterwards have a right to explain and decide upon in a judicial one. The reason is obvious; that the Judges should, in a calm and unprejudiced manner, explain what the law literally is, and not what it ought to be; that they should not be allowed to carry upon the bench those passions and prejudices which too frequently prevail in the adoption and formation of legislative acts and treaties, and which never fail to give an irresistible bias to the opinions of a Judge who has been concerned in making them. The truth of this reasoning is now so generally conceded, that there is not a man who knows anything of government that will attempt to controvert it; the constitutions of all the States have sanctioned it, and if the opinions of the Federal Convention ought to have weight, they so strongly insisted upon it as even to refuse, after repeated trials, associating the Judges with the President in the exercise of his revisionary power; indeed a gentleman high in office, and who held both situations at the same time as Judge and Envoy, is himself decidedly of this opinion, for in his charge to the Eastern juries he has these expressions:

"Wise and virtuous men have thought and reasoned very differently respecting Government; but in this they have at length very unanimously agreed, viz: "that its powers should be divided into three distinct independent departments, the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial. But how to constitute and balance them so as best to guard against abuse and fluctuation, and preserve the Constitution from encroachments, are points on which there continues to be a great diversity of opinions, and on which we all have as yet much to learn. The Constitution of the United States has therefore instituted these departments, and much pains have been taken so to form and define them, as that they may operate as checks one upon the other, and keep each within its proper limits: it being universally agreed to be of the last importance to a free people, that those who are vested with Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers should rest satisfied with their respective portions of power; and neither encroach on the provinces of each other, nor suffer themselves or the others to intermeddle with the rights reserved by the Constitution to the people."

If, then, there can be no doubt of its propriety when applied to a Judge, in ordinary cases, how much more forcibly does it apply to an Envoy who concludes a treaty, which when ratified is to become the supreme law of the land; how strongly must the negotiation of so important and in many instances so difficult a business, be impressed on his mind! He will no doubt retain the journals of his proceedings and opinions, and perfectly recollect the progress and termination of every proposal which was compromised or rejected. It must be difficult for him to forget the attempts to which Ministers are sometimes liable in condescending where their object is honorable; he will remember what his opinions were upon particular points; and, whether they were successful or not, his general character may be that of not very easily yielding them. In short it is impossible for him to be that cool and unbiassed interpreter of the treaty which he otherwise might have been, had he not been concerned in concluding it.

The Constitution contemplates an independent Judiciary. The public, therefore, will expect and have a right to demand, upon all questions, a fair and impartial trial by Judges, whose minds are open to conviction, and unprejudiced by party opinions; by men who have not been concerned in forming a law or treaty, but who are totally unfettered by the recollection of what passed at the negotiation, or what might have been wished or expected by either party, as judges, candidly and impartially to determine upon every question that may come before them.

These reasons are certainly sufficient to convince any one that this provision is necessary to the independence of the Judges, and the pure and unbiassed exposition of the laws; that unless it is done, their independence is a visionary and unfounded thing. That if the President can hold out to the Judges the temptation of being Envoys, or of giving them other offices, and that he still can continue them as Judges, that on any question in which the President or his friends, or the Government, may be concerned, it might have a tendency to influence them in opinion; that it was not frequently to be expected they would be unmindful from whom they received the present appointments, or so entirely indifferent to their own, or the advancement of their families as not sometimes to recollect that from the same source other and greater emoluments might in future be derived; that ingratitude was not often the vice of public officers while their patron continued in power; that on subjects where his character, his feelings, or the public opinion of his acts were in question, our Judges might reasonably be expected not to be chargeable with apathy or inattention; and that the true way to assert the dignity of the President and the honor and independence of the Judges, was to place it out of the power of the one to offer, and the other to accept additional favors.

That a Judge ought never to be absent from the United States, or be drawn from his official situation and leave an undue proportion of its duties to be performed by the remainder of the bench; that the number of Judges were exactly proportioned to the duties they were to perform; that to withdraw one and be incapable of supplying the vacancy, was not only to require the inexecution of the laws in some parts of the Union, but to inviscerally harass the other, while a favorite or possibly too complying a Judge was sent to gratify his curiosity or indulge his taste on some agreeable or easy mission.

That no man ought to hold two offices under the same Government, particularly where they were important; that most of the States had regulations to prevent this, and that nothing more contributed to the extravagance of a Government or the corruption and immorality of its citizens, than the power to heap many lucrative and perhaps useless offices on the same person; that it had a tendency to make them servile, to render them the tools and sycophants of men in power, and to degrade the character of office.

That in case of the impeachment of the President of the United States, the Chief Justice was to preside, and there was no provision in the Constitution to supply the vacancy; therefore, if an impeachment was to take place in his absence, it must remain undecided until the Chief Justice could be sent for; that this, if recollected by the Executive, should of itself have been an insuperable objection—in point of propriety, it always is so, but in point of delicacy it ought most strongly to have been so, because, here the President is the officer, and indeed the only one, who is implicated in the possibility of its inconvenience arising from absence of the Chief Justice. It is true it is to be presumed that the man who is elected by his countrymen to administer the important office of President, will be always so wise and virtuous as to make it very unlikely an impeachment of him should take place—the thing, however is possible. In times of difficulty where opinions run high, and where those opinions are strongly divided between numerous and powerful parties, it is impossible to foretell what may happen. No man is said to be wise at all times, and our own experience and intercourse with the world must convince us that there are moments of enthusiasm, or of heat, or surprise, when the most cautious men are not quite so prudent as others. I will therefore ask, and do it with great deference, as the President is the only officer on whose trial the Chief Justice is to preside, or on whose impeachment his absence would be a public inconvenience, is it not perhaps presuming too far on his own infallibility or incapacity to err, to send the only officer to a distant country, without whose presence, in case of an impeachment, a court could not be formed to try him? I ask it with deference, and am sure these observations must have escaped the Executive, or the Chief Justice never would have been sent.

To evince the absolute necessity of some provision being made, it is to be observed that, as the law stands now, a Judge might not only accept any other appointment from the Executive of the Union, but he may accept them from the individual States, or what is still more dangerous, from a foreign Power, and thus become the minion of the one or the tool of the other, as circumstances or his own interest may prompt him. Few men will deny the necessity of some provision here, and that the present is an unwise and degrading situation for a national judiciary. Most of the States have carefully guarded their tribunals against a danger of this kind. The State of South Carolina, to which I belong, is remarkably express on this subject. Aware of the necessity of an independent judiciary, her constitution, in speaking of that department, has these words: "nor shall the Judges hold any other office of profit or trust under this State, the United States, or any other Power," a prohibition not more complete or full than ought to exist in the case of the Federal Judges.

The not preventing, by the Constitution, the Judges from holding other offices may possibly be considered as an omission; it is true, it might as well have been there; but when we examine the power given by the Constitution to Congress, to organize and establish the judicial courts—to fix their salaries, detail their duties, and arrange and alter the system as they think proper, there can be no doubt we have a perfect right to pass the bill I shall have had the honor to propose to you. It does not go to prevent the President's right to nominate a Judge, but only to declare that if a Judge accepts any other appointment he cannot continue a Judge; a limitation which the Legislature has most unquestionably a right to annex. To Congress is left the power to fix the number of Judges, ascertain their duties and the compensation they shall receive. They therefore clearly have the right to say that a Judge, on performing certain duties, shall receive a certain salary, but that if he does not perform them he shall not receive it; cases of sickness must of course be always excepted. Congress have a right to declare by law, as I shall hereafter endeavor to induce them, that no man shall hereafter hold two offices, of profit and trust, under this Government, at the same time. There can be no question as to their right to pass such a law; and it would certainly reach the case of the Judges. It could never have been the intention of the Constitution, nor will the nature of our Government quietly admit so great an impropriety, as that a man should hold an office, the duties of which he cannot, from his absence, perform, nor can any other be appointed to perform them for him, and that this man should nevertheless be authorized, if he please, to draw the salary. We are not quite so old, and not, I trust, quite so hackneyed in the arts of European Governments, as to bear this without a murmur, or to suffer it to grow into precedent without an attempt to correct it.

If we recollect the manner in which our Judges are appointed, that circumstance alone should induce us to adopt every mode in our power to render them independent of the Executive. They are appointed by the President, and if the moment after they receive their commissions they were really so independent as to be completely out of his reach—that no hope of additional favor, no attempt to caress could be reasonably expected to influence their opinions, yet it is impossible for them ever to forget from whom they have received their present elevation. Hence I have always been of opinion, that it was wrong to give the nomination of Judges to the President; it is, however, determined by the Constitution, and while the right continues in him, it must in some degree have its effects on the good wishes and influence of a Judge in his favor. He cannot hear anything respecting him in quite so unbiassed and impartial a manner, as he would was the President unknown to him, or had he not received any favor from him. It is our duty to guard against any addition to this bias, which a Judge, from the nature of his appointment, must inevitably feel in favor of the President. It is more particularly incumbent on us when we recollect that our Judges claim the dangerous right to question the constitutionality of the laws; and either to execute them or not, as they think proper; a right in my judgment as unfounded and as dangerous as any that was ever attempted in a free government; they however do exercise it, and while they are suffered to do so, it is impossible to say to what extent it might be carried. What might be the consequences if the President could at any time get rid of obnoxious laws by persuading or influencing the Judges to decide that they were unconstitutional, and ought not to be executed? It will be said this is arguing as if all our officers were corrupt—that we should place no confidence in them—and was truly taking the dark side of the picture. To this I answer that it is our duty to guard against every possibility of influence or corruption—hence springs the necessity of laws; if all our officers were perfect, and all our citizens honest and virtuous, there would be no occasion for them, but as it is the nature of men to err, and sometimes to be vicious, our laws are incompetent unless they are calculated to meet every contingency.

A strange doctrine has lately been circulated, which it is my duty to remark on—it is, that this bill is to be considered as a reflection on the President for nominating a Chief Justice, and the Senate for having confirmed it, and that the Senate, by agreeing to it, will join in the censure. Being always ready to approve, and to praise what is meritorious, it is with great reluctance I can ever be brought to censure—I have no such intention at present. I can readily believe that many of the inconveniences I have mentioned may have escaped the President in the recent nomination. It is here I have always disliked it. I believe the general sentiment to be against it; but, be that as it may, no such reason ought ever to have weight in this House. If the thing is right, if it is now considered as proper for us to say, that the Judges must stay at home, and be confined to their judicial duties, and hold no other offices while Judges, we should do it, and not consider whether it is pleasing or otherwise to the President; he must understand public business too well to consider it in the nature of a reflection. We every day alter existing laws and regulations, without considering such changes as reflections on a preceding Legislature or President, and I should be sorry to suppose, that, while a bill was under discussion, the fear of displeasing the Executive should ever be used as a reason for its rejection. He has always a right to give his opinion in the exercise of his revisionary authority, and when he does, we will deliberately and respectfully attend to it. One remark more, and I shall no longer trespass on the patience of the House: it is, that a reason has been given for leaving the President at liberty to send a Judge on any delicate or difficult mission, which I do not conceive reputable either to the political or literary character of our country—it is said the Judges may be the most able and qualified men the President can find, and that being prevented from sending one of them, he may sometimes be obliged to send inferior and less important characters, and that the public interest might suffer. How far the present or any former supreme bench may justify the observation it is not for us to say, but never will I suppose that among a people so numerous and enlightened, so alive to their country's welfare, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, of whom are so devoted to public business, can only six men be found capable of discharging any political duties that Government might require; the idea is too degrading to our national character to be entertained for a moment. For these reasons I have thought it my duty to introduce this bill, and I trust it will pass and become a law.

THURSDAY, March 6.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment reported by the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia," and having adopted the same,

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Arnold," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. FOSTER, GOODHUE, and GREENE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman was read the second time and referred to Messrs. WATSON, GOODHUE, and LANGDON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill further to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," was read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed the 12th of December last, to take into consideration that part of the Speech of the President of the United States, which recommends a revision and amendment of the Judiciary system, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 26th of February last, that an inquiry be had relative to a publication in a newspaper called the Aurora, on the 19th of the said month.

On motion to amend the original motion, by prefacing it with these words:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States has expressly declared 'That the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people;' And whereas, to prevent any attempt being made on the part of either branch of Congress to define their own privileges, and exercise the same, as occasion or circumstances may, in their opinion, require, and to remove all doubt as to the extent and exercise of the privileges they are to enjoy, the Constitution has positively and expressly limited and defined the same, by declaring that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members; that they may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide. That they may determine the rules of their proceedings; punish the members for disorderly behaviour; and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. That the members of both Houses shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to, and returning from, the same; and for any debate or speech in either House shall not be questioned in any other place."

A motion was made to strike out from the amendment the second clause, to wit: all that follows the word "people;" and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Franklin, Goodhue, Gunn, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

And, on request, Mr. PINCKNEY had leave to withdraw the preceding part of the proposed amendment.

And, the original motion being amended, a motion was made to strike out all the words thereof after the words "Resolved, that," line 1st, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following words:

"As the Constitution of the United States does not vest in either branch of Congress any other powers on the subject of privilege than those mentioned, and limited, and defined therein, therefore, to assume any other privilege would be to diminish the rights of the people expressly reserved to them by the Constitution; to encroach on the power given to the Judicial; to disparage the right of trial by jury; and to establish the dangerous doctrine, that a single branch, without control or interference, can, at their own will, and in their own case, punish for reasons on which the Constitution has given them no power to decide."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 7.

Resolved, That this House will, on Monday next, take into consideration the report of the committee on the bill, entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday, for amending the motion made on the 26th of February last, that an inquiry be had relative to a publication, of the 19th of said month, in a newspaper called the Aurora; and

A motion was made to strike out these words: "other powers on the subject of privilege than those mentioned, and limited, and defined therein; therefore, to assume any other privilege would be to diminish the rights of the people, expressly reserved to them by the Constitution;" and to insert the word "power" before the words "to encroach."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 8.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act respecting the Mint," reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday to strike out certain words from the motion of the preceding day, on the original motion made on the 26th of February last, that an inquiry be had relative to a publication of the 19th of the said month, in a newspaper called the Aurora.

And, on the question to strike out, and to insert the word "power," as stated yesterday, it passed in the affirmative,—yeas 19, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bingham, Foster, Franklin, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

And, on motion to strike out the original motion, for the purpose of inserting the amendment as amended, it passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bingham, Chipman, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance,

SENATE.

Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

So the amendment was lost.

A motion was made to strike out, after the words "Resolved, that," line first of the original motion, and insert, in lieu thereof,

"If be an instruction to the Committee of Privileges to inquire and report whether, in their opinion, the publication of the 19th of February, contained in the newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, is a seditious libel against the Senate of the United States; and, if so, whether the Attorney General should be requested to prosecute the editor thereof for the printing and publishing the same."

And it was agreed to divide the motion, and that the question be taken on striking out; and which passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

So the motion was lost.

And, on motion to agree to the original motion as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, Watson, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

So it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Privileges be, and they are hereby, directed to consider and report what measures it will be proper for the Senate to adopt, in relation to a publication in the newspaper, printed in the city of Philadelphia, on Wednesday morning the 19th of February, 1800, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora; in which it is asserted, that the bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice President of the United States had passed the Senate, when, in fact, it had not passed; in which it is also asserted, that the honorable Mr. Pinckney, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, and a member of the committee who brought before the Senate the bill aforesaid, had never been consulted on the subject; whereas, in fact, he was present at each meeting of the committee; and, generally, to report what measures ought to be adopted in relation to sundry expressions contained in said paper, respecting the Senate of the United States, and the members thereof, in their official capacity.

LAURANCE, GOODHUE, and BINGHAM, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th of February last, for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on the first Monday in April next; and,

Resolved, That they do not concur therein.

A motion was made that a committee be appointed to inquire what laws will expire at the close of this session, or before the first Monday in December next, and make report thereof to the Senate.

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, BLOODWORTH, and CHIPMAN, be the committee.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Chipman, Dayton, Foster, Goodhue, Hillhouse, Langdon, Latimer, Livermore, Lloyd, Paine, Ross, Schureman, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Greene, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

On motion, to adopt this part of the report, as follows:

Resolved, That William Duane, now residing in the city of Philadelphia, the editor of the said newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, be, and he is hereby, ordered to attend at the bar of this House, on Monday, the 24th day of March inst., at 12 o'clock, at which time he will have opportunity to make any proper defence for his conduct, in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious assertions, and pretended information: and the Senate will then proceed to take further order on the subject; and a copy of this and the foregoing resolution, under the authentication of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and attested as a true copy by James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms for the said Senate, and left by the said Sergeant-at-Arms with the said William Duane, or at the office of the Aurora, on or before the twenty-second day of March instant, shall be deemed sufficient notice for the said Duane to attend in obedience to this resolution:

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Dexter, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Gunn, Hillhouse, Laurance, Livermore, Lloyd, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

So the report of the committee was adopted, as follows:

Whereas, on the 19th day of February, now last past, the Senate of the United States, being in session, in the city of Philadelphia, the following publication was made in the newspaper, printed in the said city of Philadelphia, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, viz:

"In our paper of the 27th ult. we noticed the introduction of a measure into the Senate of the United States, by Mr. Ross, calculated to influence and affect the approaching Presidential election, and to frustrate, in a particular manner, the wishes and interests of the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"We this day lay before the public a copy of that bill as it has passed the Senate.

"Some curious facts are connected with this measure, and the people of the Union at large are immediately, and the people of this State immediately, interested to consider the movements, the mode of operation, and the effects.

"We noticed a few days ago the caucuses (or secret consultations) held in the Senate Chamber. An attempt was made in an evening paper to give a counteraction (for these people are admirable at the system of intrigue) to the development of the Aurora, and to call those meetings jacobinical; we must cordially assent to the jacobinism of those meetings—they were in the perfect spirit of a jacobinical conclave.

"The plain facts we stated are, however, unquestionable; but we have additional information to give on the subject of those meetings. We stated, that intrigues for the Presidential election were among the objects; we now state it as a fact that cannot be disputed upon fair ground, that the bill we this day present was discussed at the caucus on Wednesday evening last.

"It is worthy of remark how this bill grew into existence.

"The opponents of independence and republican Government, who supported Mr. Ross in the contest against Governor M'Kean, are well known by the indecency, the slander, and the falsehood of the measures they pursued—and it is well known that they are all devoted to the Federal party, which we dissected on Monday. Mr. Ross proposed this bill in the Federal Senate, (how consistently with the decency of his friends will be seen;) a committee of five was appointed to prepare a bill on the subject: on this committee, Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, was appointed. On Thursday morning last (the caucus held the preceding evening) Mr. Ross informed Mr. Pinckney that the committee had drawn up a bill on the subject, when in fact Mr. Pinckney had never been consulted on the subject, though a member of the committee! The bill was introduced and passed as below.

"On this occasion it may not be impertinent to introduce an anecdote which will illustrate the nature of caucuses, and show that our popular Government may, in the hands of a faction, be as completely abused as the French Constitution has been, by the self-created Councils:

"In the Summer session of 1798, when Federal thunder and violence were belched from the pestiferous lungs of more than one despotic minion, a caucus was held at the house of Mr. Bingham, in this city. It was composed of members of the Senate, and there were present seventeen members. The Senate consisting of thirty-two members, this number was of course a majority, and the session was a full one.

"Prior to deliberation on the measures of war, navy, army, democratic proscription, &c., it was proposed, and agreed to, that all the members present should solemnly pledge themselves to act firmly upon the measures to be agreed upon by the majority of the persons present at the caucus.

"The measures were perfectly in the high tone of that extraordinary session. But upon a division of the caucus it was found that they were divided, nine against eight. This majority, however, held the minority to their engagement, and the whole seventeen voted in Senate upon all the measures discussed at the caucus.

"Thus it is seen that a secret self-appointed meeting of seventeen persons dictated laws to the United States, and not only that nine of that seventeen had the full command and power over the consciences and votes of the other eight, but that nine possessed, by the turpitude of the eight, actually all the power which the Constitution declares shall be vested in the majority only. In other words, a minority of nine members of the Senate ruled the other twenty-three members.

"It is easily conceivable, as in the recent changes in France, that this spirit of caucusing may be conducted in progression down to two or three persons; thus three leading characters may agree to act upon measures approved by any two of them; these three may add two others, and they would be a majority of five; and those adding four others would be a majority of nine; and this nine possess all the power of a majority of twenty-three!"

"Yet such is the way we are treated by those who call themselves Federalists.

"The following bill is an offspring of this spirit of faction secretly working; and it will be found to be in perfect accord with the outrageous proceedings of the same party in our State Legislature, who are bent on depriving this State of its share in an election that may involve the fate of the country and posterity."

Resolved, That the said publication contains assertions and pretended information, respecting the Senate, and the Committee of the Senate and their proceedings, which are false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States: and that the said publication is a high breach of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That William Duane, now residing in the city of Philadelphia, the editor of the said newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, be, and he is hereby, ordered to attend at the bar of this House on Monday, the 24th day of March, inst., at 12 o'clock, at which time he will have opportunity to make any proper defence for his conduct, in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, assertions and pretended information; and the Senate will then proceed to take further order on the subject: and a copy of this and the foregoing resolution, under the authentication of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and attested as a true copy by James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms for the said Senate, and left by the said Sergeant-at-Arms with the said William Duane, or at the office of the Aurora, on or before the twenty-second day of March, instant, shall be deemed sufficient notice for the said Duane to attend in obedience to this resolution.

On motion to strike out the ten first sections, and insert—

Whereas, on an election of President and Vice President of the United States, questions may arise whether an Elector has been appointed in a mode authorized by the Legislature of his State or not: Whether the time at which he was chosen, and the day he gave his vote, were those determined by Congress: Whether he were not at the time a Senator or Representative of the United States, or held an office of trust or profit under the United States: Whether one at least of the persons he has voted for is an inhabitant of a State other than his own: Whether the Electors voted by ballot, and have signed, certified, and transmitted to the President of the Senate a list of all the persons voted for, and the number of votes for each: Whether the persons voted for are natural born citizens, or were citizens of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, were thirty-five years old, and had been fourteen years resident within the United States: And the Constitution of the United States having directed that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and that the votes shall then be counted," from which the reasonable inference and practice has been that they are to be counted by the members composing the said Houses, and brought there for that office, no other being assigned them; and inferred the more reasonably, as thereby the Constitutional weight of each State in the election of those high officers is exactly preserved in the tribunal which is to judge of its validity: the number of Senators and Representatives from each State, composing the said tribunal, being exactly that of the Electors of the same State:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whensoever the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be assembled for the purpose of having the certificates of the Electors of the several States opened and counted, the names of the several States shall be written on different and similar tickets of paper and put into a ballot box, out of which one shall be drawn at a time; and so soon as one is drawn, the packet containing the certificates of that State shall be opened by the President of the Senate, and shall then be read, and then shall be read also the petitions, depositions, and other papers and documents, concerning the same; and if no exception is taken thereto, the votes contained in such certificates shall be counted, but if the votes, or any of them, shall be objected to, the members present shall, on the question propounded by the President of the Senate, decide, without debate, by yea or nay, whether such vote or votes are Constitutional or not; and the votes of one State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the ballot box, and the certificate, and the votes of the Electors of the State drawn, shall be proceeded on as before directed; and so on, one after another, until the whole of the votes shall be counted; and if the counting cannot be completed in one day, the members of the said two Houses may adjourn from day to day until it be completed."

A division of the question was called for, and that it first be taken on striking out.

A motion was made to strike out of section 1st, lines 10 and 11, these words: "and finally to decide," and to insert "into and report upon;" and a division of the motion was called for, and that the question be first taken on striking out; which passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Dexter, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Loyd, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, and Wells.

A motion was made to strike out the 7th section, and after debate,

Their answers I have also the pleasure to enclose, marked B and C. offence, and that the said William Duane should attend at the bar of the Senate on Wednesday, then next, at 12 o'clock, of which the said Duane had due notice.

DISPUTED PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice President of the United States.

Before the question was taken on the passage of the bill, Mr. PINCKNEY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The question now before the Senate is on the passage of the bill. It having been understood as agreed, that we would reserve ourselves on its constitutionality until this period, I have some claim to expect your indulgence, while I review, not only that subject, but the principal features of the bill—while I endeavor to show that it is a serious invasion of some of the most important rights solemnly and explicitly reserved by the Constitution to the State Legislatures: that it is a bill more alarming in its consequences than even the alien or sedition law; because, however unfriendly I conceive those to have been in their principles and operation to the liberties of the people, yet after March next we are to hope nothing but the mournful reflection will remain that such laws have ever existed; while the act before you is to continue as a perpetual one, unlimited in its consequences and duration, and is to exist as a check or diminution of those important rights which, by the Constitution, are solely and exclusively vested in the State Legislatures, or under their direction, with the people, and with which Congress have no power to interfere, except in the manner I shall hereafter detail. I am indeed more anxious on this subject, as on many important points the majorities in the Senate were small, and as I well know the subject will excite very great public attention. The States and the State Legislatures will feel themselves particularly concerned, and I have some reason to suppose that such of those as I represent, and who are of my opinion, will expect from me a defence of what they consider as their just rights.

I will begin my remarks on this subject, by asserting that all powers not specifically given to Congress by the Constitution, are reserved to the States or the people respectively; that this is the base and principle of the Government; that without any express declaration on the subject, or any amendment to the original instrument, this is the construction we are obliged to give it; but that when we couple with this construction the 12th amendment, which the jealousy of the States insisted upon, there can be now no question, that in the language of that amendment, the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by the Constitution to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

It is of essential importance in examining this bill to recur to those amendments and the reason of their being adopted. This appears in the caption of the resolution recommending the amendments to the adoption of the States. It is in these words:

"The conventions of a number of States having, at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added; and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best insure the beneficent end of its institution; therefore Congress, according to the Constitutional mode, recommended to the States to agree to, and their Legislatures did adopt, such of the amendments as are now officially directed to be annexed to the Constitution."

By this caption it appears that jealousies and suspicions existed in the States; that they were anxious to have some declaration of the principle of the system to be ascertained on the subjects of religion and the press, and the rights of the people, and the State Legislatures. They knew that parties would arise, and that as in all Governments unprincipled and designing men had existed, they saw no reason to expect that their own would be without them; they therefore determined that an explicit Constitutional declaration should be annexed, expressly stipulating that the powers not specifically delegated were reserved, and that the prohibitions and reservations mentioned in the amendments should be added, in the nature of a bill of rights.

When those amendments became a part of the Constitution, it is astonishing how much it reconciled the States to that measure; they considered themselves as secure in those points on which they were the most jealous; they supposed they had placed the hand of their own authority on the rights of religion and the press, and the as sacred right of the States in the election of the President; that they could with safety say to themselves, "On these subjects we are in future secure; we know what they mean and are at present; and such as they now are, such are they to remain, until altered by the authority of the people themselves—no inferior power can touch them. In our adorations to our Maker, our right to remark on public men and measures, and the exclusive right of the State Legislatures and people to elect the Supreme Executive, Congress have no authority to interfere. They are not within the ordinary sphere of its legislation." I appeal to any man, who dispassionately peruses the Constitution and its amendments, and who recollects the mode and reasons of their adoption, to answer if this was not the construction then understood, and which now ought always to be given to them? It is the one I shall ever contend for, and it is on this ground I shall endeavor to show that Congress have no right to pass the bill before you, or to legislate at all further on the subject, than they have done by the act of 1792.

I suppose it will hardly yet be denied, that the people are the common fountain of authority to both the Federal and State Governments; that the Constitution reposes exclusively in the State Legislatures for the formation of a part of the Federal Government, and in the people for another part; and that in the appointment or formation of their part, the rights of the State Legislatures and people are exclusive: that the State Governments are the pillars upon which the Federal Government must rest, and that without a cordial and active performance of their duty, the latter could not proceed or exist. That, in the formation of the Federal Government, the people found that their safety consisted in giving certain exclusive rights to the State Legislatures, in the election of Senators and of their President—the first to insure to the State Governments their existence as such, and their equality in the second branch, and the other to make their Executive completely independent of the National Legislature.

In examining these exclusive rights, we will at once perceive that in the mode of voting for Senators, no other part of our Governments can interfere than our State Legislatures; if they neglect or refuse to elect, there is no power to compel them. The only authority to interfere is the Senate of the United States, and their power extends only to the determination whether a Senator is constitutionally qualified, or properly commissioned, and in discussing this neither the President nor House of Representatives can interfere.

With respect to the House of Representatives, for important reasons, there is a substantial difference. A right is in the first instance given to the State Legislatures, to establish regulations for their election, and in the same clause a right is given to Congress—not to the House of Representatives, but to Congress—not only to make regulations on the same subject, but to alter such as the State Legislatures have made; giving to Congress, in fact, a paramount authority, whenever they please, to regulate the elections of the House of Representatives in any manner they think proper. Let us for a moment compare this with the directions of the Constitution respecting the Electors of a President, and then permit me to call your attention to the remarkable difference there is between them, and the reasons for this difference.

By the Constitution, Electors of a President are to be chosen in the manner directed by the State Legislatures—this is all that is said. In case the State Legislatures refuse to make these directions there is no power to compel them; there is not a single word in the Constitution which can, by the most tortured construction, be extended to give Congress, or any branch or part of our Federal Government, a right to make or alter the State Legislatures' directions on this subject. The right to make these directions is complete and conclusive, subject to no control or revision, and placed entirely with them, for the best and most answerable reasons. It was intended to give your President the command of your forces, the disposal of all the honors and offices of your Government, the management of your foreign concerns, and the revision of your laws. Invested with these important powers, it was easily to be seen that the honor and interest of your Government required he should execute them with firmness and impartiality; that, to do this, he must be independent of the Legislature; that they must have no control over his election; that the only mode to prevent this was to give the exclusive direction to the State Legislatures in the mode of choosing Electors, who should be obliged to vote secretly; and that the vote should be taken in such manner, and on the same day, as to make it impossible for the different States to know who the Electors are for, or for improper domestic, or, what is of much more consequence, foreign influence and gold to interfere; that by doing this the President would really hold his office independent of the Legislature; that instead of being the creature, he would be the man of the people; that he would have to look to them, and to the confidence which he felt his own meritorious actions would inspire, for applause or subsequent appointments.

Instead of this, what is the mode proposed by this bill? That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall each of them elect six members, who with a chairman, to be appointed by the latter from a nomination of the former, would form a grand committee, who should, sitting with closed doors, have a right to examine all the votes given by the Electors in the several States for President and Vice President, and all the memorials and petitions respecting them; and have power finally to decide respecting them, and to declare what votes of different States shall be rejected, and what admitted; and, in short, that this committee, thus chosen, and sitting with closed doors, shall possess complete, uncontrollable, and irrevocable power to decree, without appeal from their decision, who has been returned, and who shall be proclaimed President of the United States.

As long and as much as I have been accustomed to examine this bill, and consider its contents, I cannot recapitulate its objects and extent without new emotions of surprise. I am astonished that a measure so completely calculated to deprive the State Legislatures of their most important and exclusive rights in the election of the Chief Magistrate, should be at once brought forward, without paving the way by some milder preparatory measure, of the same tendency. It is true, the sedition law, by giving to the Federal Courts a power to decide on libels, a right which we contend belongs exclusively to the State Courts, and of which we think they cannot constitutionally be divested; and the untenable doctrine, avowed by the Federal Judges, that there is a common law, such as is in force in Great Britain, common to the courts of the United States, may be considered as preparative. Had the people quietly acquiesced in these doctrines, and generally expressed no disapprobation of them, there might have been some reason to suppose they had determined silently to submit to everything, and even without a murmur put up with this diminution of the authority of the State Legislatures. But, when we recollect the unanswerable arguments that have been used throughout every part of the Union against them; when we see not only individuals but Legislatures of important States, using the mild and Constitutional mode of remonstrance and argument; when we have found not only the tables of the State Legislatures, but of Congress itself, covered with memorials against them, lamenting in the most affecting language their adoption and execution; I cannot, under these circumstances, suppose that we are authorized to believe the public mind so much under the influence of implicit confidence as to think that a measure which strikes so forcibly at the reserved rights of the States, can be received by them without particular emotions. It is my duty, however, to examine it with freedom, and this I shall do with candor and deference to other gentlemen's opinions, who differ from me on the subject.

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in, or control over the election of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the Electors so transmitted. It never was intended, nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution, to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention, the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the Electors shall vote; the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of Electors, and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity, as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect, that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, that party spirit would not prevail, and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections, and that in determining upon these, it was more than probable, the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests? Or must they not have supposed, that, in putting the ultimate and final decision of the Electors in Congress, who were to decide irrevocably and without appeal, they would render the President their creature, and prevent his assuming and exercising that independence in the performance of his duties upon which the safety and honor of the Government must forever rest?

But it is said, are Congress bound to receive every vote of an Elector, whether it is constitutionally given or not? Suppose votes are sent for a person not a citizen or fourteen years a resident of the United States; or under thirty-five years of age; or that the Legislature of a State has not authorized by their act the votes of the Electors, or that double returns are made: who are then to decide? Or has not Congress, under these circumstances, a power to determine which of the votes shall be received or rejected?

These being the avowed reasons for introducing this bill, I answer them by observing, that the Constitution having directed that Electors shall be appointed in the manner the Legislature of each State shall direct, it is to be taken as granted that the State Legislatures will perform their duties, and make such directions as that only qualified men shall be returned as Electors. The disqualifications against any citizen being an Elector, are very few indeed; they are two. The first, that no officer of the United States shall be an Elector; and the other, that no member of Congress shall. The first, an indispensable one, because every officer of the United States is nominated by the President, and (except Judges) removable at his pleasure. The latter, that no member of Congress shall, is a provision which goes unanswerably to prove the solidity of my objections to this bill, and to show how extremely guarded the Constitution is in preventing the members of Congress from having any agency in the election, except merely in counting the votes.

They well knew, that to give to the members of Congress a right to give votes in this election, or to decide upon them when given, was to destroy the independence of the Executive, and make him the creature of the Legislature. This therefore they have guarded against, and to insure experience and attachment to the country, they have determined that no man who is not a natural born citizen, or citizen at the adoption of the Constitution, of fourteen years residence, and thirty-five years of age, shall be eligible.

These are all the provisions in the Constitution, and being specifically defined and clearly marked out, where is the necessity of this bill? Is not the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and must not the State Legislatures conform their directions in the appointment of Electors to the directions of the Constitution? Have they not always determined, that persons qualified as the Constitution directs shall be chosen as Electors; and in the three elections which have taken place, has there been a single mistake or error in the vote?

Was not the last election as much contested as the ensuing, or any one can be, and were not the votes regularly given? Why this anxiety, why these unnecessary efforts to take from the State Legislatures their exclusive and most valuable right? Why should we be afraid that our citizens should be so forgetful of their safety, as to vote for men holding offices under the United States, or members of Congress; men who are not only disqualified, but who must, from their connexions with the Government, be always unsafe depositaries of this trust.

Who, when he reflects on the immense power the President possesses, can suppose that any man, honorably selected by his fellow-citizens as an Elector, could for a moment be so lost to a sense of his own and his country's welfare, as to vote for a man as the Supreme Executive, whose citizenship or residence were doubtful, and who were not of sufficient age? Gentlemen who support the bill have confessed they thought it improbable, and that it may not happen once in a century; but still they say it is possible, and ought to be guarded against. I consider both as so extremely improbable, that I am astonished they are mentioned. So far from having any apprehension of this sort, we may be assured that while the office of President is accompanied by so much power and patronage, while it is so honorable to its holder and influential to his friends, there can be no doubt that only such men will ever be spoken of, or even thought of or nominated as candidates, as are the most conspicuous for talents, and whose experience of our public affairs is generally acknowledged. Nor need we ever be afraid that in this country too young men will be brought forward as candidates. There is a jealousy against young men, or men not much advanced in years, which will forever forbid their being nominated for this office with much hope of success. Men do not like to see their juniors, or even those of the same ages, taking the lead, or being more conspicuous for talents or knowledge than themselves. They erroneously consider it as a reflection on their own deficiencies; they will therefore invariably unite in preferring a man much advanced in years, whose honors would occasion them no invidious sensations, and whose age and long employment in public life have accustomed them to his elevation. Regardless of his errors, or capacity to govern, they will more cordially unite in promoting him, than one whose rise they will consider as too rapid, and whose political exertions have given them pain. Be assured, sir, there can never be any fear of too young men being promoted to this situation. The danger is entirely on the other side of the question; that none but men too old will be brought forward; men whose minds have lost their energy, and whose age and infirmities render them incapable of sustaining the great and increasing weight of an important, and arduous situation.

To prevent, therefore, candidates of doubtful residence or citizenship, or under the requisite age, being elected as President, can never be sufficient reasons with the House for adopting this bill in the face of the Constitution, even if they had the power. I suppose there must be more weight in the other reasons, or they would not agree to it.

These are, that suppose a State Legislature should so far forget its duty, as not to pass some legislative act or resolution, directing the manner in which, within the proper time, Electors of a President should be elected, and the people should, notwithstanding, assemble and elect under a different authority; would the votes of the Electors, under these circumstances, be receivable? Or suppose that two different sets of Electors should insist that they were constitutionally elected, and that double returns should be transmitted, one certified by the Governor of the State, and the other not; which are to be received, and who is to have the power to decide to which the preference is to be given?

On this subject I am to remark, that the Constitution supposes a mutual confidence to exist between the Federal and State Governments; that not only in its formation, but in the strict and honorable performance of their relative duties, there will be the greatest punctuality and exactness; that neglect, and particularly refusal, on the part of either, must endanger the existence of both; and that until the case does actually arise, it is extremely impolitic in either to suspect it, and particularly to adopt measures in anticipation, on suspicions unsupported by proofs, to meet situations that have never yet occurred, or probably never will. That it ought to be a federal principle, and a rule with the Government, never to doubt the attachment of the States, in the performance of their Constitutional duties. That as they have hitherto regularly appointed Electors and Senators, and members of the other branch, that they will continue to do so, and cheerfully to contribute to the general expenses; that in return they will expect from the Government complete and adequate protection in their public and private rights, and a Constitutional attention to such as are explicitly reserved to the people and the State Legislatures. That they will govern themselves by the Constitution, and suffer no suspicions, jealousies, or unfounded reports, to hurry them into acts invading the State right. That, as it is so much the interest of the States to exercise their right in the election of a President, it is to be presumed that every State Legislature will seek with avidity each returning opportunity of doing so. That whatever they may surmise or threaten, that when the time arrives no few men will dare to oppose numerous and important States expressing their opinion, or giving their votes on so interesting an election; particularly where the opinion has been so recently and decidedly expressed on questions of the same political tendency. That there was no doubt of every State fairly and honorably voting, and of every Executive constitutionally discharging the duties of his station. That we had no more right to suppose, from what has hitherto happened, that an Executive or State Government would break the Constitution, than they had to think that Congress and the President would do so. That if the General Government went into measures to restrain or control the States in the exercise of their duties, might it not unnecessarily give rise to a spirit of discord, destructive to the harmony which ought ever to exist between them? That, in every view in which the subject presents itself, it is certainly most wise to suffer things to remain as they are, and to be content with the regulations of the act of 1792, which go as far, and perhaps in one or two particulars of no importance, even farther than the Constitution warrants.

To show the extreme impropriety of adopting this bill, I will, for argument sake, suppose that there might be some irregularities in the votes of Electors, or even in the conduct of the Executive of a State on this subject; and ask, whether, even under these circumstances, it would not be safer and less injurious to the interests of the people, that these few irregular votes, if transmitted and certified by an Executive, should be received and counted, than that a new and unknown power like this should be created, under whose control not a few, but every vote that is given, must be reviewed, and received or rejected as they decree?

If the bill is not passed, we are to depend, as we have hitherto done, on the attachment of the States, and the good sense and integrity of their Executives. We have, particularly on the Executive of a State, the strong hold of public opinion. He will recollect that his character is at stake, and that if he suffers party views or private interest or resentment to govern his conduct, that he stands alone, and is individually responsible. That so far as respects his agency in the authentication of the election of the Electors, he has no body of men under the cover of whose advice he can shield himself; but that in case of misbehaviour, he must alone meet the public censure. That to deserve the confidence of his country, he ought never to submit to temporary expedients, or court the fleeting breath of popular applause; he must recollect what are his Constitutional duties, and to those, and those only, he must conform. That this has always been the conduct of the Executives of the States, and under that conduct we have been safe. That the Constitution makes this dependence on the States necessary, and as we have never yet been disappointed, we are to hope we never shall. But, surely, its friends never could have considered the extent and danger of giving to this committee, or even to Congress, the right to decide on double returns, or they must immediately have seen the extreme impropriety of attempting it. It is, in short, nothing less than holding out to the minority in all the States, a temptation to dispute every election, and to always bring forward double returns. In every State where the election is strongly contested, there will of course be a minority. It will be easily known by the measures of Congress, to which candidate the majority of that body inclines, and whose friends will compose the committee that are to be thus packed and selected. If a minority in a particular State find that the candidate they have unsuccessfully supported is the favorite one with the majority of Congress, or their committee, they will easily discover the means of raising objections to the validity of the return of the Electors, insist that they themselves are elected, proceed to the length of meeting and voting, and transmit to Congress a double return.

It will not be difficult for them to accompany their return with plausible reasons, and perhaps with such unfounded assertions, and specious although false documents, as to give to the committee some colorable reason for rejecting the return of the Electors, certified by the Governor, and admitting the other. Knowing the situation of the Union; how differently some States think from others on political questions; how divided Congress have been for some years, on certain great and trying subjects; who that is a friend to harmony and the Constitution, and to that easy, tranquil mode of deciding these elections which has hitherto prevailed, can wish to go into a measure so calculated to produce unceasing disputes, and to throw almost every State into scenes which can never arise but from this bill?

Can there be any one who would thus hazard the reserved rights of the State Legislatures and the people, and commit them to a body unknown to and unauthorized by the Constitution? Why should we suppose that the Congresses which have preceded us did not understand this subject as well as we do, or any that may succeed us?

In 1792, being the first time the exercise of this power was necessary, Congress passed a law, entitled "An act relative to the election of President and Vice President," &c., directing how the States should appoint Electors for the election; when they should meet and vote; that they should sign three certificates of all the votes given; directing how the votes should be disposed of; detailing the duty of the Executive of each State in certifying the lists of Electors chosen; of the Secretary of State on the non-receipt of votes; that Congress shall always be in session on the second Wednesday in February in every fourth year, for the purpose of opening and counting the votes, and declaring a President elected agreeably to the Constitution; ascertaining the duties, allowances to, and penalties on persons sent with the votes; and making provision in case of the death of both President and Vice President, or their refusal to serve, and fixing the time when their service commences.

It is very important in deciding on the bill before you, to peruse this act with great attention; to recollect by whom, and when, and under what circumstances, it was made. This law was passed in 1792, when a number of able and well informed men, who have been since appointed to some of your most respectable situations at home and abroad, and many who have voluntarily retired with deserved and well-earned honor to private life, filled the seats of both Houses of Congress: when the Executive authority was held by Gen. WASHINGTON, for whom your whole nation at present mourns; by him who had no rival in the public affection, whose honors no man envied, and whose re-election to office as long as he pleased, he well knew, would always have been without contest; in him was placed the revision of your laws. And here, sir, let me ask, whether from a Congress thus ably formed, and from an Executive thus discerning and independent, as much knowledge of the Constitution, its precise directions, and the agency it intended Congress to have in the counting the votes and declaring the President, were not to have been expected, as from the present? Were not the then Executive, and a number of the members of both Houses, members of the Convention which framed the Constitution; and if it intended to give to Congress, or to authorize them to delegate to a committee of their body, powers contemplated by this bill, could the Congress or the President of 1792, have been so extremely uninformed, and indeed ignorant of its meaning and of their duty, as not to have known it? I have heard many motions and measures which have been introduced here, termed as intended reflections on the present President; but surely no more severe reflections on the mistakes or ignorance of the Congress and President of that day can be passed than this bill. It will exhibit to the world our decided opinion, that they were both ignorant of the powers of their respective departments, and both neglected to declare and assert them. An impartial public will, however, feel themselves interested on this very important occasion to recollect the circumstances under which the act of 1792 was passed, and those under which the present attempt has been made, and upon comparing them, to examine and decide for themselves. They will find, that in that year they possessed as able and independent a Congress as they can ever reasonably expect to see again; that they were then in perfect peace; no treaty had been made with Britain, or alliance dissolved with France; no depredations vexed their commerce; no improper partialities for contending nations divided their councils; respecting and alike respected by the whole family of the civilized world, their country was the residence of peace and industry, and the asylum of the oppressed of every nation. Their Constitution was universally admired; it was drawing to them a great share of wealth, the arts and information of Europe: no rival candidates contended for the chair, it was filled by him who had no opponent, and who was in the succeeding year again unanimously summoned to occupy it. Under circumstances so favorable to the impartial exercise of those legislative duties, will not our citizens be inclined to suppose that the act of 1792 was a proper one, and that there was more probability of its provisions being in a temperate and unbiassed conformity to the Constitution, than any act which could be passed at this time? A time when no man can say we are at peace, or that our commerce is free from depredations; or that strong contending parties do not divide our councils and citizens, as well with respect to foreign politics, as to him who is hereafter to fill the Executive department; a time, when it is out of the question not to suppose that each party will use every means to secure their favorite object.

If, after comparing these circumstances, our citizens should carefully peruse the express directions of the Constitution, they will have but little doubt to which act to give the preference, as the proper and Constitutional one. By viewing the 1st section of the 2d. article of the Constitution, it is to be seen, that on the day fixed by law, which is the second Wednesday in February, the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then, the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House shall in like manner choose the President. From this part of the Constitution it is evident that no power or authority is given to Congress, even when both Houses are assembled in convention, further than to open and count the votes, and declare who are the President and Vice President, if an election has been made; but that in case no election is made by the Electors, or no candidate has a majority, then the House of Representatives are (voting by States) immediately to choose, out of the five highest on the list, the President, &c.

In order that every man may understand what is here meant by the Constitution, and what is its express directions and letter as to this election, let us examine what is the literal meaning of the word immediately, and why it was introduced here. The best and most generally admired expounders of the English language, give this explanation of the word immediately; they say it means "instantly"—at the present time—without delay. This is the meaning the framers of the Constitution intended to give it, and it admits of no other. The plain, express, literal direction of that instrument therefore is, that in case of no election, the House of Representatives, voting by States, are immediately, that is instantly, and on the spot, without leaving the House in which they are then assembled, and without adjournment, to choose, out of the five highest candidates that have been voted for by the Electors, the one who is to be the Executive.

The reasons for this immediate election are, in my judgment, unanswerable; they show very clearly the foresight and caution of the Convention, and, if not strictly attended to, may be productive of the most serious calamities to our country. The reasons are these: that from our rapidly increasing strength and commerce, from the enterprise of our citizens, and our particular maritime situation as it respects the West Indies, South America, and the Powers having possessions in both, it was easily to be seen, that in any conflict between these Powers, our friendship or hospitality must be of the greatest importance; that they therefore would never cease to interfere in our politics and endeavor to direct them in the manner most suitable to their own interests; that from the difficulty of influencing so large a body as Congress, and from the immense power of the President, not only over the laws, but foreign connexions of the Union, that their principal effort would be always to have one of their own friends chosen; and to effect this, no influence would be left untried. To prevent this therefore, and to make the Executive independent of Congress, the election has been given exclusively to the States, under the direction of the State Legislatures. If an election is made by the Electors, and subject to no future control or revision on the part of Congress, then the end intended by the Constitution, of preventing the interference of foreign influence, is completely answered: for, elected as they are, and voting as the Electors must, the interference of foreign gold, or influence, is impossible. But it was to be supposed, that instances would occur, where two candidates, having a majority, may be equal in their number of votes; or where no candidate had a majority of the whole of the Electors appointed, and an election must take place by the National Legislature, or a branch of it; the question then arose, how was this election to be guarded to prevent, as far as human prudence could, improper domestic combinations, or, what is infinitely worse, foreign interference? It was a difficult thing, and required much deliberation. The Constitution directs that the Electors shall vote by ballot, and seal up and transmit their votes to the President of the Senate. It is expected and required by the Constitution, that the votes shall be secret and unknown, until opened in the presence of both Houses. To suffer them to be known, as heretofore, has been the practice, is unconstitutional and dangerous, and goes to defeat in some measure, the wise provisions of that instrument, in declaring, that when the House of Representatives are to elect, that it shall be done immediately. The Electors, therefore, ought never to divulge their votes. The votes being thus unknown, it would be impossible in most instances to say who were elected or who had the five highest numbers on the list. The leaders of domestic intrigue and foreign emissaries would be at a loss how to direct their influence, and the election by the House of Representatives taking place immediately after the votes have been opened and counted, that body would go to the election free and uninfluenced, as they ought. And is not this, sir, safer; is it not better than that the smallest delay should take place in determining it? You are to choose, out of the five highest candidates on the list of the Electors' votes; it never can be supposed, that men thus deliberately chosen as Electors, would vote for any but the most distinguished amongst our citizens, or point the attention of the public, or of the House of Representatives, to obscure or improper characters. The five having the highest number of votes, will all be such men as that either of them, if chosen, will be well qualified to fill the office; and it will be less dangerous to the public interest, that even one who may not be the most qualified of the five, should be elected, than that Congress should adjourn to deliberate on it, and thus expose themselves, and the best interests of their constituents, to the secret and artful attacks that will be made on their integrity.

It is to be remembered, that around the seat of Congress will be placed all the open and accredited Ministers, as well as secret emissaries, of foreign Powers. Here too will be assembled the concealed leaders of domestic faction; all the arts and intrigues that have been used in Elective Governments in the Old World, will soon find their way among us; and if the Electors do not conceal their votes until the day appointed by law for opening them, and in case of no election by them, an immediate one by the House of Representatives does not take place, we shall soon have the scenes of Polish Diets and elections re-acted here, and in not many years the fate of Poland may be that of United America.

Wisely foreseeing this, the Constitution expressly orders that the Electors shall vote by ballot; and we all know, that to vote by ballot is to vote secretly; that the votes shall be sealed up, and not opened until the day appointed by law, and that if no election has been made by the Electors, an immediate one shall take place by the House of Representatives; that so far from appointing committees to receive memorials or petitions respecting the election, or decide upon it, or so far from having any right to delegate an authority on this subject, that Congress shall not themselves, even when in convention, have the smallest power to decide on a single vote; that they shall not have authority to adjourn for one moment, but shall instantly and on the spot, in case of no election by the Electors, proceed to the choice of a President, and not separate until it is determined.

I have intentionally gone into repetitions on this subject, in order to impress on the House the full meaning and intent of the word immediately; and to show how utterly unconstitutional it would be for Congress, either acting in their separate chambers or in convention, to attempt to assume to themselves the power to reject a single vote; and how inadmissible must be the idea that they could delegate it to a small packed committee, chosen by the prevailing majorities in both Houses, and sitting with closed doors, authorized irrevocably to decree who shall be proclaimed President; a committee not even to be appointed by lot, as was proposed, in imitation of the election committee of Great Britain—a measure which might have had the appearance of giving to the friends of all the candidates some chance of being on it; not limited, as was afterwards moved, in imitation of that part of the Constitution which respects the making of treaties, to the number of two-thirds being necessary for every decision; but to a committee, chosen by the majorities of both Houses, just as their own political opinions and prejudices shall prompt.

Extraordinary and unconstitutional as this mode of choosing a committee must appear, and new and unknown as are the powers intended to be given to it, perhaps no part of the bill strikes us with more astonishment, than that the deliberations on all these great and important questions are to be in secret, and that the committee are to sit with closed doors. We have hitherto been taught to believe, that only on Executive business, or communications deemed by the Executive of either branch to be of a secret nature, that our citizens were to be denied the right of being present if they please; but that on all legislative subjects, most particularly on all questions respecting elections, the deliberations of the body who are to have power finally to decide, must, from the nature of our Government, be open and uncovered.

I have heard that at a time when upon all other questions the doors of the Senate were shut, yet that when the right of a Senator to keep his seat was discussed, they were ordered to be thrown open. If then, on a subject in which the rights of a single State Legislature were investigated, you deemed it proper the debates and decisions should be in public, how much more important is it that every eye should be entitled to inspect the conduct, and every ear to listen to the decisions of a body, on whose decree, without appeal, are to depend the rights of every Legislature in the Union? Can it be supposed that this extraordinary measure will meet the public approbation? Can we be ignorant of the jealous temper of our citizens, their general information, and their persevering and laudable endeavors to be acquainted with our measures? Do we not suppose that the State Legislatures will feel particularly alive on this subject, and that they who by their perseverance have formerly unbarred the doors of the Senate, and opened your legislative deliberations to the public view, will scarcely suppose that an investigation so much more important than any legislative act, should be veiled from a jealous inspection? Will they not remember, that in all contested elections of members of either House, the debates are in public; and by concealing these, will it not be a reason with them to believe you doubt your right to act at all? If upon elections in a State Legislature, or the National one, petitioners have a right to be heard openly and by counsel, ought not the same right to exist in an election where all the Legislatures and all the people are concerned? It is no answer, or no reason for sitting with closed doors, to say that the testimony is to be entered in writing on the journals of the committee, and the members are to enter their reasons, and sign them for rejecting a vote. It is not to know the result of their deliberations, or what laws they pass, that creates the necessity for deliberative bodies in free countries sitting with open doors; it is, that the public eye may be constantly upon them; that all their movements may be seen, and all opinions they give on public questions or in debate carefully attended to. When a single member in the House of Representatives may represent the interests of above thirty thousand citizens, and in the Senate upwards of hundreds of thousands, or where a committee of thirteen are to decide on the election of the officer who is to preside over upwards of five millions of people, most surely every opinion and every motion of each member should be strictly scrutinized. If ever there could be good reasons for opening the deliberations of any assembly of men to the public view, they must apply with redoubled force to this; if ever the opinions, or steadiness, or integrity of a body should be vigilantly attended to, it must be of one who are to possess full and irrevocable power to reject or receive the votes of the Electors as they please, and finally, to decide. It is a power too important to be exercised in the dark; it is contrary to what ought to be the practice of every Government, whose pride it should be to invite the investigation of their constituents, and, instead of retiring from the public eye, to wish "that there was a window in its bosom."

It is among the precepts of our religion, that we should continually pray not to be led into temptation: to avoid being tempted to do improper things, would be an excellent rule with public bodies, as well as with individuals; many private crimes would be prevented, and many indiscreet and unconstitutional public acts not even thought of. Self-interest or revenge are sometimes so powerful incentives, that temptations to pursue the one or gratify the other are frequently not to be resisted. To no public body has ever a stronger temptation been held out, than this bill offers to the House of Representatives. If the election by the Electors can be destroyed by any means, the Constitution gives to that House the election of the President; if, therefore, their favorite candidate has not the majority of votes, but come so near, that the rejecting a few of the rival's votes will prevent an election and bring it to their House, how easy is it for them to elect six members, whose opinions they have previously known, and that Senator out of the three nominated by the Senate whom they can most depend upon, as fitted for their purpose, and with these to destroy the election, and assume to themselves the power of deciding who is to be your Supreme Executive? Considering the influence and authority of this officer, how much he will have it in his power to reward such tried friends as these, friends who have proved themselves so valuable to him as to have set aside the election of his opponent, who ought to have been the successful candidate, and placed himself in the Chair, I ask, if it is not a temptation too great to offer to any single body, like the House of Representatives?

And if the Constitution, by the most sacred construction, had ever permitted or intended such an event, whether it would have deserved the encomiums it has hitherto received? Whether, instead of having a really independent Executive, chosen under the direction of the State Legislatures, in a manner to prevent the influence of foreign gold, or domestic faction, whose election, in order that he may be firm in the exercise of his revisionary power, and honest in the disposition of the public honors, was not to be subject to the control or interference of Congress; one who could be really called the man of the people, and on whom they could depend: whether, instead of having an officer like this, you would not have a fettered, dependent creature of the Legislature, the production of their little packed committee, a thing with a chain on his pen, and a curb in his mouth, that could neither write, speak, or even sign his name, but at the will of his creator; and whether this thing, when presented, however he might be called and obeyed, would deserve to be considered such a President of the United States as the Constitution intended?

I now come to a part of the bill, on which, should it become a law, it appears to me that insuperable difficulties would arise, and this is the section which respects testimony. By the 13th section it is said, that persons petitioning against the votes, given by any of the Electors of President or Vice President of the United States, and persons desirous of supporting such contested votes, may respectively obtain testimony in the same manner, and under the same rules and regulations, which are provided by the act, entitled "an act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses." And the rules, regulations, and penalties of the said act, are and shall be extended to cases arising under this act, as fully as if the same were herein fully recited and enacted.

By the act to which this alludes, any Judge of the Courts of the United States or of a State, or, if they cannot be conveniently obtained, two justices of the peace, are, on application of the parties contesting elections, to issue a warrant or summons to witnesses, to attend at some convenient time and place; if they are not at their usual place of residence, service of a copy is sufficient; and for non-attendance the fine is only twenty dollars. The party whose election is opposed, is to be served with notice of this intended opposition, and of the time and place when these witnesses are to be examined. If it is said he was not at home, proof of a copy of the notification being left is sufficient, and the judge or justices are to proceed, ex parte, to take the testimony. It does not appear by the most attentive perusal of the act, that the officers or persons who are to serve the notice are to depend on the judge or justices, or known public officers: but may be any persons the party opposing the election may choose; they may be some of his own particular friends or dependents, or persons he can direct as he pleases.

In examining this act, we must immediately perceive that it is extremely defective, even as it respects the election of members of the House of Representatives; but that should it ever be relied upon in the decision of the election of a President of the United States, and the choice of this important officer, the intended man of the people, was to depend upon the testimony, which, under the cover of this act, fraud, or force, or bribery, might produce, the evils to this country would be monstrous indeed.

By this act we are prevented from the viva voce examination of witnesses before Congress or the committee; that examination which, on the trial of the meanest culprit and for the smallest offence, your just and equitable laws render indispensable; that mode which allows you to look a witness steadily in the face, to view in it the calmness of conscious innocence, or the agitation of falsehood and the fear of detection; in the presence of an anxious and inquiring public to probe his statements to the bottom, and if they are false to confront him with the truth. How far superior, sir, is this, to the regulations of the act, where examinations are to be taken by commission, in a manner that must for ever open a door for the grossest impositions. If a judge of some superior or inferior court is not to be conveniently found—and in the interior and frontier parts of a number of the States this will frequently be the case—the whole management of this business is to depend upon two justices of the peace, who are to issue the warrant or summons, and examine and reduce the testimony to writing and transmit it to the seat of Government. I trust I shall be believed when I say, that few men have, indeed that no man has, a higher respect or affection for the people of the United States than I have; that I believe them to be the most immaculate, and easily governed, and at the same time the best intentioned people in the world. I cannot therefore be suspected of the most distant reflection, in supposing that in some of the States, where objections may be made to the elections or qualifications of Electors, and it may by this bill be necessary to take testimony, that some judge, or chancellor, or justice of the peace, may be found, who may not be men of good character, or men of sufficient knowledge or technical skill to be entrusted with the taking of the testimony, or the cross-examination of witnesses, on whose assertions may depend so important an election. Recollecting that there are some thousands of judges, chancellors and justices of the peace, resident in so extensive and populous a country as the United States, it would be wonderful indeed, if some of them were not men of letters, or not sufficiently informed to manage so difficult and delicate an examination as this is, with sufficient acuteness and ability; but if we extend the idea, and suppose that amidst so numerous a body of men it is possible some of them may be tampered with, and made subservient to the purposes of party, to reduce testimony to writing in a mangled or partial manner, to omit or add, as they may be tempted, the alarming consequences that might flow from their misconduct scarcely need to be mentioned; they must strike the most superficial observer. How easy, too, is it under this act, for the contesting party to employ dependents of his own, who may so manage the transmission or delivery of the notices, as that the Elector, or person whose qualifications or election is contested, may not receive them at all, or receive them so late as to make his appearance in time before the justices impossible? In short, if we view the difficulties that must attend the attempt to obtain testimony on this subject that can be at all depended upon, the door that it will open to bribery, and perjury, and fraud of every description, it must at once appear that the Constitution could never have contemplated giving Congress any authority on the subject. They knew it was impossible, from the great distance of some of the States, that viva voce examinations could take place before that body; that on this occasion all others were inadmissible; they therefore determined, that the inquiry into the election and qualifications of the Electors, and the constitutionality of their votes, should be given to and rest exclusively with the State Legislatures; and that the certificate of the Executive of a State, of the Electors appointed, and the votes of such Electors regularly transmitted, must be received and counted. If this was not to be the case, and the bill before you was to become law, as you have now determined that the 7th section should be struck out, and that the committee shall have power, finally, to decide without restrictions, I wish to be informed, where are the committee to stop their inquiries? In States where the Electors are chosen by a general vote, or by districts, and where thousands of voters may ballot for a candidate, are the committee to examine into the return of every Elector, and into the qualifications of every vote? Or in others, where the Electors are chosen by the Legislature, are the committee to inquire into the legality of the return of every member of a State Legislature? Or how is it possible for this committee, or for Congress itself, either to have the time or means to make these inquiries, so as to be able to determine with exactness, or with justice to the parties?

But let us suppose that this committee, or even Congress itself, are determined to exercise this power, and should receive memorials and petitions, and collect testimony, and should be of opinion that one or more Electors of a State have not been duly elected, or are not constitutionally qualified; how are Congress then to proceed to find how these unduly or disqualified Electors voted, particularly if they should belong to a State having a number of Electors? As the Constitution directs they are to vote by ballot, the votes of the election ought to be secret. You have no right to require from an Elector how he voted, nor will you be able to know for whom he did vote, particularly if in the return from that State different candidates have been voted for. In this dilemma, I ask, what is to be done? You cannot discover for whom this disqualified or improperly returned Elector voted; and you would not certainly, in a State having sixteen or twenty-one votes, reject the whole, because one or two illegal votes have been supposed to be given.

From the most attentive consideration of this part of the subject, I believe no satisfactory answer can ever be given to the question I ask; that the objection I have stated can never be removed; that if there was no other good reason for supposing the Constitution did not intend to give to Congress any control or examination into the election, this of itself is sufficient, and proves the wisdom of that instrument's vesting it exclusively in the State Legislatures.

Another serious objection to this bill, or to the exercise of this power, either by Congress or a committee, is, that the Executives of the States and the State Legislatures are equally bound with Congress, by oath, "to support the Constitution;" it is an oath they all take at the commencement of each new Legislature. If therefore a number of the Legislatures of the most important States in the Union should be of opinion, with me, that this is a right exclusively vested in them by the Constitution, which they have solemnly sworn to preserve, and that consistently with their oaths they cannot quietly acquiesce in a diminution of it, or suffer any invasion by a body having no Constitutional authority to interfere, might not such sentiments, firmly expressed and adhered to, unnecessarily give rise to a conflict of opinions, at least, that had better always be avoided? We know the force of religious opinions in this country, and how tenaciously oaths are in general adhered to; and surely, nothing but some strong and pressing necessity could ever excuse, if anything can excuse, an interference on so delicate a subject. And where, sir, is this necessity at present? Have not the States, and their Legislatures and Executives, always punctually and faithfully executed every duty the Constitution required of them? Have you any documents before you to prove some of them mean to misbehave, or any proofs to justify your adopting a measure of this kind? Are the opinions of individuals, or perhaps unfounded anonymous publications, to precipitate you into differences with the States, at a time when harmony is so essential to our general welfare? Do you recollect the contests that are now prevailing in the Old World on the subject of Government and its principles, and how important it is to us to avoid a clashing of opinions between Congress and the States on the subject of their reserved rights, at a time when not only this but every Constitutional principle should be touched with the greatest delicacy? We should recollect that it is also highly necessary at this time to impress our citizens with the most favorable opinions of the integrity of the Government, particularly as it respects the election of their President; they now know that chosen by Electors, elected under the exclusive direction of the State Legislatures, within only a short time of the election, and voting on one day throughout the Union, it is impossible for foreign or domestic gold, or factions, to influence the election; as it stands now, corruption must ever keep at a distance; it can never assail your Electors, or sully the purity of their choice. Give, however, the power of deciding on their votes, and of rejecting or receiving them, as they please, to thirteen men, all of the same political description, all wishing the same men, sitting with closed doors, and whose deliberations are removed from the public eye, and you will find it difficult to avoid just suspicion; your jealous citizens will remember that secrecy always accompanies corruption, and that even if this committee were to act in the most honorable manner, yet still that the friends of the candidate whose votes have been refused, if such refusal cost him his election, will never cease to suspect that all has not been fair, and that some improper reason had influenced the decision. I could urge a variety of other objections against this bill; but I am afraid I have already too long trespassed on your patience. I will therefore here conclude my remarks, with entreating the House not to destroy the beautiful harmony and safety which the Constitution at present insures, both to the States and the General Government; a safety which must depend on a strict adherence to its principles, and to the judicious distribution of its authorities; that while the States are wisely prohibited from interfering with those really national powers which can alone be safely exercised by the General Government, for the purposes of national defence and protection, that Government is in its turn checked from overstepping the boundaries of the Constitution, by the reserved powers to the States and the people, and by their exclusive rights of election, as I have fully stated to you. Instead of injuring, let it be our care to preserve unimpaired this valuable system. I should be sorry that any part of the Government should be chargeable with a wish to violate it; but feeling, as we must always do, a particular affection for that branch of it to which we belong, I should be extremely sorry indeed that this bill should pass the Senate.

Let us remember that the election is intended by the Constitution, once in every four years, as an appeal to the people for their opinions respecting the preceding Administration. If the conduct of the Executive has been wise, disinterested, and impartial, there can be no doubt that the good sense and virtue of our citizens will continue him in office, or, if he wishes to decline, elect a successor of similar principles. On the contrary, if he has not proved himself able and judicious, and the measures of his Administration do not accord with the public sentiment, they will have an opportunity, mildly and gently, through the force of the elective principle, to remove him, and place in his stead some man of different political conduct and opinions. This appeal, however, can never be fairly and independently made to the people, if Congress are to have the smallest control or revision of the election, because, the majority of them must always be intimately connected with the measures of Administration. The President can never proceed without the support of Congress; their approbation must sanction all the laws and all the supplies which his views have occasioned; and the people, in expressing by the election their sentiments of the conduct of the Executive, must, at the same time, necessarily give an opinion on that of the Legislature. This is another reason for rejecting the bill; and as it appears, since the 7th section has been struck out, several gentlemen have altered their opinions, I am not without hopes, when the question is taken, we shall find ourselves in a majority, that it will not pass, and that the exclusive rights of the State Legislatures will be preserved inviolate.

When Mr. P. had concluded, the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16 nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Chipman, Dayton, Dexter, Foster, Goodhue, Greene, Hillhouse, Latimer, Lloyd, Paine, Read, Ross, Schureman, Tracy, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bloodworth, Brown, Cocke, Franklin, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Mason, Nicholas, and Pinckney.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice President of the United States."

"That the face of the bills to be emitted read as follows, viz:

"The possessor of this bill shall be paid — Spanish milled dollars, by the thirty-first day of December, 1786, with interest in like money, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, by the State of —, according to an act of the legislature of the said State, of the — day of —, 1780.

"That the said new bills shall be struck under the direction of the Board of Treasury, in due proportion for each State, according to the said monthly quotas, and lodged in the Continental loan offices in the respective States, where the Commissioner to be appointed by Congress, in conjunction with such persons as the respective States appoint, shall attend the signing of said bills, which shall be completed no faster than in the aforesaid proportion of one to twenty of the other bills brought in to be destroyed, and which shall be lodged for that purpose in the said loan offices.

"That, as the said new bills are signed and completed, the States, respectively, on whose funds they issue, receive six-tenths of them, and that the remainder be subject to the orders of the United States, and credited to the States on whose funds they are issued, the accounts whereof shall be adjusted agreeably to the resolution of the 6th of October, 1779.

"That whenever interest on the bills to be emitted shall be paid prior to their redemption, such bills shall be thereupon exchanged for others of the like tenor, to bear date from the expiration of the year for which such interest is paid.

"That the several States be called on to provide funds for their quotas of the said new bills, to be so productive as to sink or redeem one-sixth part of them annually after the first day of January next."

Conformably to which all the States, excepting North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, then invaded, were furnished with their several proportions of bills for emission, and, excepting Connecticut, and Delaware, did issue various sums of them, which passed into circulation at a considerable discount from the nominal value, and which in circulation continued to depreciate.

Provision for redemption of bills of the above description, has been made by the States which issued them at different periods and rates of value: but those provisions seem not to have given satisfaction to all the creditors, as, under the act of Congress, passed February 12th, 1793, entitled "An act relative to claims against the United States not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted," claims were lodged against the United States for payment of bills issued by the individual States as aforesaid, to amount of dollars

Upon any of which interest has not been paid by the United States, nor is proof shewn that demand for it was made, agreeably to said resolution. Such of the petitioners whose names are entered as claimants under said act of February 12th, 1793, appear to be holders of bills issued chiefly by the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island.

The committee are informed that New Hampshire has provided for the redemption of those issued by that State, at the rate of one silver dollar for five dollars of their nominal amount.

Massachusetts, by the act funding the debt of that Commonwealth, passed February 1st, 1794, provided for receiving on loan new emission bills of that State, "at the rate of one dollar silver for four dollars of those bills, calculating the interest due on their face up to July 1st, 1794, and issuing a certificate for the principal and interest at five per cent., payable semi-annually."

Rhode Island, by act of Assembly, passed July (second session) 1780, providing for emitting bills conformably to the above resolution, ordered an annual tax for six years, as a fund for their redemption: a considerable sum of them has been paid into that State's treasury by tax; for those outstanding, no further provision has been made.

Upon this general view of the subject which presents itself, in considering the description of debt upon which interest is demanded, the committee are of opinion that the United States cannot be holden to make payment of interest on said bills, when there has not been demand made for such payment, agreeably to the terms of said resolution of Congress, and the endorsement on them.

The committee do not decide what would be the consequence, had such demand for payment of interest been proved; that subject not having been committed

72 WELBECK-STREET, LONDON.
September 20, 1798.

SIR: I beg leave, through you, to offer to the House of Representatives of the United States, impressions of the two prints of the American Revolution, which I have lately caused to be published.*

The importance of the events, and the illustrious characters of the two great men to whose memory they are particularly devoted, give to these works their best claim to your notice; and the patriotism of my countrymen, I trust, will give them a kinder reception than their intrinsic merit might entitle me to hope.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JNO. TRUMBULL.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps. U. S.

Resolved, That the rules and orders of proceeding established by the late House of Representatives, shall be deemed and taken to be the rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this House, until a revision or alteration of the same shall take place.

Resolved, That each member be furnished with three newspapers, printed in this city, during the session, at the expense of this House.

*The prints referred to by Mr. Trumbull, in his letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, are, first, a representation of the Battle of Quebec, and death of General Montgomery; second, the Battle of Bunker's Hill—both elegant engravings. PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to attend them in receiving the communication from the President of the United States, agreeably to his notification to both Houses yesterday.

The Senate attended and took seats in the House; when, both Houses being assembled, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES came into the Representatives' Chamber, and addressed them as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

It is with peculiar satisfaction that I meet the sixth Congress of the United States of America. Coming from all parts of the Union, at this critical and interesting period, the members must be fully possessed of the sentiments and wishes of our constituents.

The flattering prospects of abundance, from the labors of the people, by land and by sea; the prosperity of our extended commerce, notwithstanding interruptions occasioned by the belligerent state of a great part of the world; the return of health, industry, and trade, to those cities which have lately been afflicted with disease; and the various and inestimable advantages, civil and religious, which, secured under our happy frame of Government, are continued to us unimpaired, demand, of the whole American people, sincere thanks to a benevolent Deity, for the merciful dispensations of his providence.

But, while these numerous blessings are recollected, it is a painful duty to advert to the ungrateful return which has been made for them, by some of the people, in certain counties of Pennsylvania, where, seduced by the arts and misrepresentations of designing men, they have openly resisted the law directing the valuation of houses and lands. Such defiance was given to the civil authority as rendered hopeless all further attempts, by judicial process, to enforce the execution of the law; and it became necessary to direct a military force to be employed, consisting of some companies of regular troops, volunteers, and militia, by whose zeal and activity, in co-operation with the judicial power, order and submission were restored, and many of the offenders arrested. Of these, some have been convicted of misdemeanors, and others, charged with various crimes, remain to be tried.

To give due effect to the civil administration of Government, and to insure a just execution of the laws, a revision and amendment of the judiciary system is indispensably necessary. In this extensive country it cannot but happen that numerous questions respecting the interpretation of the laws, and the rights and duties of officers and citizens, must arise. On the one hand, the laws should be executed; on the other, individuals should be guarded from oppression. Neither of these objects is sufficiently assured under the present organization of the Judicial Department. I therefore earnestly recommend the subject to your serious consideration.

Persevering in the pacific and humane policy which had been invariably professed and sincerely pursued by the Executive authority of the United States, when indications were made on the part of the French Republic, of a disposition to accommodate the existing differences between the two countries, I felt it to be my duty to prepare for meeting their advances, by a nomination of Ministers upon certain conditions, which the honor of our country dictated, and which its moderation had given a right to prescribe. The assurances which were required of the French Government, previous to the departure of our Envoys, have been given through their Minister of Foreign Relations, and I have directed them to proceed on their mission to Paris. They have full power to conclude a treaty, subject to the Constitutional advice and consent of the Senate. The characters of these gentlemen are sure pledges to their country that nothing incompatible with its honor or interest, nothing inconsistent with our obligations of good faith or friendship to any other nation, will be stipulated.

It appearing probable, from the information I received, that our commercial intercourse with some ports in the island of St. Domingo might safely be renewed, I took such steps as seemed to me expedient to ascertain that point. The result being satisfactory, I then, in conformity with the act of Congress on the subject, directed the restraints and prohibitions of that intercourse to be discontinued, on terms which were made known by proclamation. Since the renewal of this intercourse, our citizens, trading to those ports, with their property, have been duly respected, and privateering from those ports has ceased.

In examining the claims of British subjects, by the Commissioners at Philadelphia, acting under the sixth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, with Great Britain, a difference of opinion, on points deemed essential, in the interpretation of that article, has arisen between the Commissioners appointed by the United States and the other members of that Board, from which the former have thought it their duty to withdraw. It is sincerely to be regretted that the execution of an article produced by a mutual spirit of amity and justice, should have been thus unavoidably interrupted. It is, however, confidently expected that the same spirit of amity, and the same sense of justice in which it originated, will lead to satisfactory explanations. In consequence of the obstacles to the progress of the commission in Philadelphia, His Britannic Majesty has directed the Commissioners appointed by him under the seventh article of the Treaty, relating to British captures of American vessels, to withdraw from the Board sitting in London: but with the express declaration of his determination to fulfil, with punctuality and good faith, the engagements which His Majesty has contracted by his Treaty with the United States; and that they will be instructed to resume their functions, whenever the obstacles which impede the progress of the commission at Philadelphia shall be removed. It being, in like manner, my sincere determination, so far as the same depends on me, that, with equal punctuality and good faith, the engagements contracted by the United States in their treaties with His Britannic Majesty shall be fulfilled, I shall immediately instruct our Minister at London to endeavor to obtain the explanations necessary to a just performance of those engagements, on the part of the United States. With such dispositions on both sides, I cannot entertain a doubt that all difficulties will soon be removed, and that the two boards will then proceed and bring the business committed to them, respectively, to a satisfactory conclusion.

The act of Congress relative to the seat of the Government of the United States, requiring that, on the first Monday of December next, it should be transferred from Philadelphia to the district chosen for its permanent seat, it is proper for me to inform you that the Commissioners appointed to provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress and of the President, and for the public offices of the Government, have made a report of the state of the buildings designed for those purposes in the city of Washington; from which they conclude that the removal of the seat of Government to that place, at the time required, will be practicable, and the accommodations satisfactory. Their report will be laid before you.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I shall direct the estimates of the appropriations necessary for the service of the ensuing year, together with an account of the revenue and expenditure, to be laid before you. During a period in which a great portion of the civilized world has been involved in a war unusually calamitous and destructive, it was not to be expected that the United States could be exempted from extraordinary burdens. Although the period is not arrived when the measures adopted to secure our country against foreign attacks can be renounced, yet it is alike necessary to the honor of the Government and the satisfaction of the community, that an exact economy should be maintained. I invite you, gentlemen, to investigate the different branches of the public expenditure; the examination will lead to beneficial retrenchments, or produce a conviction of the wisdom of the measures to which the expenditure relates.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

At a period like the present, when momentous changes are occurring, and every hour is preparing new and great events in the political world, when a spirit of war is prevalent in almost every nation with whose affairs the interests of the United States have any connexion, unsafe and precarious would be our situation were we to neglect the means of maintaining our just rights. The result of the mission to France is uncertain; but, however it may terminate, a steady perseverance in a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country, is an obvious dictate of wisdom: for, remotely as we are placed from the belligerent nations, and desirous as we are, by doing justice to all, to avoid offence to any, nothing short of the power of repelling aggressions will secure to our country a rational prospect of escaping the calamities of war, or national degradation. As to myself, it is my anxious desire so to execute the trust reposed in me, as to render the people of the United States prosperous and happy. I rely, with entire confidence, on your co-operation in objects equally your care; and that our mutual labors will serve to increase and confirm union among our fellow-citizens, and an unshaken attachment to our Government.

JOHN ADAMS.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Address to be presented to the

6th CON.—7

President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses, at the commencement of the present session.

Mr. GREGG moved, that the words distinguished by italics, in the third and fourth lines of the second paragraph of the Address, be struck out, and that the words “act in” be inserted in their stead; which produced a short debate, and was finally negatived.

The Committee then rose, and the Address was reported without amendment; and was agreed to by the House, in the words following, viz:

To the President of the United States:

SIR: While the House of Representatives contemplate the flattering prospects of abundance from the labors of the people, by land and by sea, the prosperity of our extended commerce, notwithstanding the interruptions occasioned by the belligerent state of a great part of the world, the return of health, industry and trade, to those cities which have lately been afflicted with disease, and the various and inestimable advantages, civil and religious, which, secured under our happy frame of Government, are continued to us unimpaired, we cannot fail to offer up to the benevolent Deity our sincere thanks for these the merciful dispensations of his protecting Providence.

That any portion of the people of America should permit themselves, amid such numerous blessings, to be seduced by the arts and misrepresentations of designing men into an open resistance of a law of the United States, cannot be heard without deep and serious regret. Under a Constitution where the public burdens can only be imposed by the people themselves, for their own benefit, and to promote their own objects, a hope might well have been indulged that the general interest would have been too well understood, and the general welfare too highly prized, to have produced in any of our citizens a disposition to hazard so much felicity, by the criminal effort of a part, to oppose with lawless violence the will of the whole. While we lament that depravity which could produce a defiance of the civil authority, and render indispensable the aid of the military force of the nation, real consolation is to be derived from the promptness and fidelity with which that aid was afforded. That zealous and active co-operation with the judicial power, of the volunteers and militia called into service, which has restored order and submission to the laws, is a pleasing evidence of the attachment of our fellow-citizens to their own free Government, and of the truly patriotic alacrity with which they will support it.

To give due effect to the civil administration of Government, and to insure a just execution of the laws, are objects of such real magnitude as to secure a proper attention to your recommendation of a revision and amendment of the judiciary system.

Highly approving, as we do, the pacific and humane policy which has been invariably professed and sincerely pursued by the Executive authority of the United States, a policy which our best interests enjoined and of which honor has permitted the observance, we consider as the most unequivocal proof of your inflexible perseverance in the same well chosen system, your preparation to meet the first indications on the part of the French Republic, of a disposition to accommodate the existing differences between the two countries, by a nomination of Ministers on certain conditions, which the honor of our country unquestionably dictated, and which its moderation had certainly given it a right to prescribe. When the assurances thus required of the French Government, previous to the departure of our Envoys, had been given through their Minister of Foreign Relations, the direction that they should proceed on their mission, was, on your part, a completion of the measure, and manifests the sincerity with which it was commenced. We offer up our fervent prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the success of their embassy, and that it may be productive of peace and happiness to our common country. The uniform tenure of your conduct, through a life useful to your fellow-citizens and honorable to yourself, gives a sure pledge of the sincerity with which the avowed objects of the negotiation will be pursued on your part, and we earnestly pray that similar dispositions may be displayed on the part of France. The differences which unfortunately subsist between the two nations, cannot fail, in that event, to be happily terminated. To produce this end, to all so desirable, firmness, moderation, and union at home, constitute, we are persuaded, the surest means. The character of the gentlemen you have deputed, and still more, the character of the Government which deutes them, are safe pledges to their country, that nothing incompatible with its honor or interest, nothing inconsistent with our obligations of good faith or friendship to any other nation, will be stipulated.

We learn, with pleasure, that our citizens, with their property, trading to those ports of St. Domingo with which commercial intercourse has been renewed, have been duly respected, and that privateering from those ports has ceased.

With you, we sincerely regret that the execution of the sixth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, with Great Britain, an article produced by a mutual spirit of amity and justice, should have been unavoidably interrupted. We doubt not that the same spirit of amity, and the same sense of justice in which it originated, will lead to satisfactory explanations; and we hear with approbation that our Minister at London will be immediately instructed to obtain them. While the engagements which America has contracted by her Treaty with Great Britain, ought to be fulfilled with that scrupulous punctuality and good faith to which our Government has ever so tenaciously adhered, yet no motive exists to induce, and every principle forbids us to adopt a construction which might extend them beyond the instrument by which they are created. We cherish the hope that the Government of Great Britain will disclaim such extension, and by cordially uniting with that of the United States for the removal of all difficulties, will soon enable the boards appointed under the sixth and seventh articles of our treaty with that nation, to proceed, and bring the business committed to them respectively to a satisfactory conclusion.

The buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the President, and for the public offices of the Government at its permanent seat, being in such a state as to admit of a removal to that District by the time prescribed by the act of Congress, no obstacle, it is presumed, will exist to a compliance with the law.

With you, sir, we deem the present period critical and momentous. The important changes which are occurring, the new and great events which are every hour preparing in the political world, the spirit of war which is prevalent in almost every nation with whose affairs the interests of the United States have any connexion, demonstrate how unsafe and precarious would be our situation, should we neglect the means of maintaining our just rights. Respecting, as we have ever done, the rights of others, America estimates too correctly the value of her own, and has received evidence too complete that they are only to be preserved by her own vigilance, ever to permit herself to be seduced by a love of ease, or by other considerations, into that deadly disregard of the means of self-defence, which could only result from a carelessness as criminal as it would be fatal concerning the future destinies of our growing Republic. The result of the mission to France is, indeed, sir, uncertain. It depends not on America alone. The most pacific temper will not always insure peace. We should therefore exhibit a system of conduct as indiscreet as it would be new in the history of the world, if we considered the negotiation happily terminated because we have attempted to commence it, and peace restored because we wish its restoration. But, sir, however this mission may terminate, a steady perseverance in a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country, is an obvious dictate of duty. Experience, the parent of wisdom, and the great instructor of nations, has established the truth of your position, that, remotely as we are placed from the belligerent nations, and desirous as we are, by doing justice to all, to avoid offence to any, yet nothing short of the power of repelling aggressions will secure to our country a rational prospect of escaping the calamities of war or national degradation.

In the progress of the session, we shall take into our serious consideration the various and important matters recommended to our attention.

A life devoted to the service of your country, talents and integrity which have so justly acquired and so long retained the confidence and affection of your fellow-citizens, attest the sincerity of your declaration, that it is your anxious desire, so to execute the trust reposed in you as to render the people of the United States prosperous and happy.

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address.

MESSRS. MARSHALL, RUTLEDGE, and SEWALL, were appointed a committee to wait on the President, to know when and where he would be ready to receive the Address; and having performed that service, reported, that the President had appointed to-morrow, two o'clock, for that purpose, at his own house.

Address to the President.

H. OF R.

The Committee then rose, and the House having taken up the consideration of the resolutions, as reported, the first and third were agreed to; and on motion of Mr. DENT, the question on agreeing to the second, was postponed till to-morrow.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Mr. GALLATIN, the House ordered the appointment of a standing committee of Ways and Means. A motion that it consist of one member from each State, was made; but on Mr. HARPER's observing that nine were found a sufficient number last session, and were able to obtain every information, and would be more expeditious in doing business, the latter motion was agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. HARPER, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. OTIS, Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. POWELL, Mr. JOHN BROWN, Mr. STONE, Mr. NOTT, and Mr. PLATT, be appointed.

Ordered, That the credentials of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, who has appeared as a Delegate from the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that they be directed to report whether the Territory is entitled to elect a Delegate who may have a seat in this House.

TUESDAY, December 10.

MATTHEW CLAY, from Virginia, appeared produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. GRISWOLD from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made a report, which was ordered to be printed.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution postponed yesterday, which, after being read, was agreed to in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That so much of the Speech of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the expenditure of public moneys, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved the following resolution, which was adopted to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provision ought to be made, by law, for the punishment of such persons as may be discovered in making attempts to alienate the affections of any Indian nation, tribe, or chief, from the United States; or in exciting them to hostilities against the United States; or to the violation of any existing treaty; and that the said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HARRISON called up the consideration of the resolution which he laid upon the table on Friday last, relative to the judiciary establishment of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and the resolution having been read, on motion, it was agreed to by the House.

MESSRS. CRAIK, HARRISON, and BIRD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Lardner Clark, a citizen of the United States, residing at Kaskaskias, in the Northwestern Territory, praying for the confirmation of his title to a certain tract of land granted under the old French Government, the papers ascertaining his right to which had been lost or destroyed. Referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a bill or bills, providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; and that the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE, the House came to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a Post Office and post roads within the United States.

MESSRS. THATCHER, WOOD, NEW, CLAIBORNE, and GROVE, were appointed the committee.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The hour having arrived which the PRESIDENT had appointed, Mr. SPEAKER, attended by the members present, proceeded to the President's house, to present him their Address in answer to his Speech at the opening of the present session; and having returned, the President's reply thereto was read, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

This very respectful address from the Representatives of the people of the United States at their first assembly, after a fresh election, under the strong impression of the public opinion and national sense, at this interesting and singular crisis of our public affairs, has excited my sensibility, and receives my sincere and grateful acknowledgments.

As long as we can maintain, with harmony and affection, the honor of our country, consistently with its peace, externally and internally, while that is attainable, or in war, when that becomes necessary, assert its real independence and sovereignty, and support the Constitutional energies and dignity of its Government, we may be perfectly sure, under the smiles of Divine Providence, that we shall effectually promote and extend our national interests and happiness.

The applause of the Senate and House of Representatives, so justly bestowed upon the volunteers and militia, for their zealous and active co-operation with the judicial power, which has restored order and submission to the laws, as it comes with peculiar weight and propriety from the Legislature, cannot fail to have an extensive and permanent effect, for the support of Government, upon all those ingenuous minds who receive delight from the approving and animating voice of their country.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, December 10.

And then the House adjourned till to-morrow morning, 11 o'clock.

H. OF R.

Direct Tax Law, &c.

DECEMBER, 1799.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

HENRY LEE, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. D. FOSTER laid the following resolution on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations ought to be made in the law, entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign country;" and that the committee have power to report by bill or otherwise.

THE DIRECT TAX LAW.

Mr. HARPER said, that a difficulty had arisen in the State of Pennsylvania, relative to the execution of the law "for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and for the enumeration of slaves, within the United States," which the Commissioners for that State did not conceive themselves competent to decide upon; that the Commissioners had referred the case to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose opinion it was, that they were possessed of sufficient power to obviate the difficulties complained of; but the Commissioners, on again taking the subject into consideration, were still of opinion they were unable to act without legislative aid, and therefore had made application to the Committee of Ways and Means, who, Mr. H. said, had directed him to move for leave to bring in a bill, further to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and for the enumeration of slaves, within the United States," which was granted.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO W. H. HARRISON.

Mr. HARPER laid the following resolution on the table.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill, extending the privilege of franking to W. H. Harrison, a delegate from the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and making provision for his compensation.

Mr. H. said, that according to law, that gentleman had the right only of speaking and giving his opinion upon any question before the House, but was not entitled to a vote, or any other privilege; but as the privileges of a member had been extended on a former occasion to a delegate from the Southwestern Territory, he had no doubt they would be granted on the present.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, moved the following resolution, which was adopted by the House, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions which were depending and undecided at the last session of Congress, ought to be taken up and acted upon by the House, as the same may be called for by any member, or upon the application of the individual claimant or petitioner.

THURSDAY, December 12.

Mr. OTIS moved the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make inquiry into the state of the naval equipments ordered by former acts of Congress; to consider whether any, and what, other naval force may be necessary for the protection of the commerce of the United States, and for the support of its flag; and whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the law relative to the Navy of the United States.

MESSRS. PARKER, OTIS, RUTLEDGE, CRAIK, and CHAMPLIN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. D. FOSTER called up the resolution which he laid on the table on Tuesday, relative to the slave trade; and the same having been read, was agreed to by the House.

MESSRS. DWIGHT FOSTER, BIRD, and JONES, were appointed committee.

Mr. SEWALL moved that when the House adjourn it do adjourn till Monday. After a few observations from Mr. RUTLEDGE, who said time ought to be given to the committees to prepare their reports, and, until made, there was little else to occupy the attention of the House; the question was put and carried, 48 rising in favor of it.

MONDAY, December 16.

THOMAS HARTLEY, from Pennsylvania, and JOSEPH EGGLESTON, from Virginia, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. GREGG presented a petition of Robert Sturgeon, late a revenue officer of the United States, in the county of Mifflin, State of Pennsylvania, and now in the jail of the said county, for arrearages of money due by him to the United States, praying that a law may be passed for his liberation; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provision ought to be made for the punishment of such persons as may be discovered in making attempts to alienate the affections of the Indians on our frontiers from the United States, reported "a bill for the preservation of peace with the Indian tribes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday.

Mr. OTIS, pursuant to leave given for that purpose, reported "a bill extending the privilege of franking to William Henry Harrison, a delegate from the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and making provision for his compensation;" which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Elections, made a report, certifying the due election of all the members who have produced their credentials; which was read and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate have passed an act entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," and "An act for reviving and continuing suits and proceedings in the Circuit Court for the district of Pennsylvania," to which they request the concurrence of the House.

DECEMBER, 1799.

Militia Law.

H. OF R.

The former was read a first and second time and committed to a Committee of the Whole for to-morrow. The latter was read a third time and passed.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of William Henry Harrison, Esq., a delegate from the Northwest Territory, made a report, which concluded with the following resolution:

Resolved, That William Henry Harrison a delegate from the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, be admitted to have a seat in this House with the right of debating but not of voting."

which was committed to a Committee of the whole House this day.

The report was subsequently taken up and agreed to by the House.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported "A bill providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States;" which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. G., from the same committee, also reported "a bill supplementary to the act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, within the United States," which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole for to-morrow.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. GRAY, be appointed a Committee for Enrolled Bills, on the part of this House, jointly, with such committee as shall be appointed for that purpose on the part of the Senate.

THE MILITIA LAW.

Mr. LEE moved the following resolution, which was adopted by the House, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the militia law of the United States."

In prefacing his motion, Mr. L. said he wished to call the attention of the House to a subject highly interesting to the citizens of the United States, and deserving the serious attention of its Legislature. He thought the system heretofore pursued was radically wrong, and viewed every measure which was not predicated on the wishes of the people, as answering but little effect. He wished to see that system of defence which, growing out of nature, shall enable all men to serve without injuring their families. The youth of our country should alone be called upon, who would be found sufficiently adequate for its defence, and seventeen and twenty-six were the ages of which the defenders of our country should consist. When father and son are arrayed in the same ranks, a wavering must take place, and present an opportunity for an impression from the enemy. He concluded a concise and elegant speech, by moving the above resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. HENRY LEE, Mr. SMITH, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. SHEPARD, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. TALIAFERRO, and Mr. SUMTER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

TUESDAY, December 17.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill providing for salvage in case of recapture, which was read a first and second time and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, within the United States;" and the bill having been read, was agreed to without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. OTIS moved, that the Committee of the Whole to whom were referred the bill from the Senate for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, be discharged; and that the bill be committed to the select committee to whom were referred a similar subject. Agreed to.

Mr. O. said, he made this motion, in consequence of some recent information which he had received on the subject from the Judge of the District Court of Pennsylvania. The bill from the Senate was merely a copy of the old law, in which there were several imperfections. He had not yet had time to mature his reflections on the alterations necessary to be made in the bill, but expected if it were committed, (as he proposed,) to receive such additional information from the District Judge, on this subject, as would render the law, if passed, more beneficial, and competent to the purposes for which it was intended.

WEDNESDAY, December 18.

The bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, within the United States," was read a third time and passed.

Mr. SPEAKER said, he had received a letter, addressed to him, in the French language, (of which he had procured a translation,) from six French officers, confined in jail, at Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, which was read and referred to the Secretary of the Navy.

The letter stated that they had been in imprisonment six months; that their usage was contrary to that of enemy officers in the power of the French Republic, who allowed them to depart either for their own or a neutral country; and that American officers were not detained in France as prisoners of war. Wherefore, they pray to be allowed to depart for their own or for a neutral country.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report and estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred; also, a statement of the receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States, for one year preceding the first day of October, one thousand seven hundred and nine-

DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

Mr. MARSHALL, in a voice that bespoke the anguish of his mind, and a countenance expressive of the deepest regret, rose, and delivered himself as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Information has just been received, that our illustrious fellow-citizen, the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army, and the late President of the United States, is no more!

Though this distressing intelligence is not certain, there is too much reason to believe its truth. After receiving information of this national calamity, so heavy and so afflicting, the House of Representatives can be but ill fitted for public business. I move you, therefore, they adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and then the House adjourned till to-morrow morning, 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, December 19.

SAMUEL GOODE, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

Mr. MARSHALL, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The melancholy event which was yesterday announced with doubt, has been rendered but too certain. Our WASHINGTON is no more! The Hero, the Sage, and the Patriot of America—the man on whom in times of danger every eye was turned and all hopes were placed—lives now only in his own great actions, and in the hearts of an affectionate and afflicted people.

If, sir, it had even not been usual openly to testify respect for the memory of those whom Heaven had selected as its instruments for dispensing good to men, yet such has been the uncommon worth, and such the extraordinary incidents which have marked the life of him whose loss we all deplore, that the whole American nation, impelled by the same feelings, would call with one voice for a public manifestation of that sorrow which is so deep and so universal.

More than any other individual, and as much as to one individual was possible, has he contributed to found this our wide-spreading empire, and to give to the Western world its independence and its freedom.

Having effected the great object for which he was placed at the head of our armies, we have seen him converting the sword into the ploughshare, and voluntarily sinking the soldier in the citizen.

When the debility of our federal system had become manifest, and the bonds which connected the parts of this vast continent were dissolving, we have seen him the Chief of those patriots who formed for us a Constitution, which, by preserving the Union, will, I trust, substantiate and perpetuate those blessings our Revolution had promised to bestow.

In obedience to the general voice of his country, calling on him to preside over a great people, we have seen him once more quit the retirement he loved, and in a season more stormy and tempestuous than war itself, with calm and wise determination, pursue the true interests of the nation, and contribute, more than any other could contribute, to the establishment of that system of policy which will, I trust, yet preserve our peace, our honor, and our independence.

Having been twice unanimously chosen the Chief Magistrate of a free people, we see him at a time when his re-election, with the universal suffrage, could not have been doubted, affording to the world a rare instance of moderation, by withdrawing from his high station to the peaceful walks of private life.

However the public confidence may change, and the public affections fluctuate with respect to others, yet with respect to him they have in war and in peace, in public and in private life, been as steady as his own firm mind, and as constant as his own exalted virtues.

Let us then, Mr. Speaker, pay the last tribute of respect and affection to our departed friend—let the Grand Council of the nation display those sentiments which the nation feels.

For this purpose I hold in my hand some resolutions, which I will take the liberty to offer to the House.

Mr. MARSHALL having handed them in at the table, they were read, and unanimously agreed to by the House, in the words following, to wit:

The House of Representatives of the United States, having received intelligence of the death of their highly valued fellow-citizen, GEORGE WASHINGTON, General of the Armies of the United States, and sharing the universal grief this distressing event must produce, unanimously resolve:

1. That this House will wait on the President of the United States, in condolence of this national calamity.

2. That the Speaker's chair be shrouded with black, and that the members and officers of the House wear mourning, during the session.

3. That a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to report measures suitable to the occasion, and expressive of the profound sorrow with which Congress is penetrated on the loss of a citizen, first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

4. That when this House adjourns, it will adjourn until Monday next.

Ordered, That Mr. MARSHALL and Mr. SMITH be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States, to know when and where he will receive this House for the purpose expressed in the first resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. MARSHALL, Mr. CRAIK, Mr. HENRY LEE, Mr. EGGLESTON, Mr. SMITH, Mr. STONE, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. ABIEL FOSTER, Mr. MUHLENBERG, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, Mr. FRANKLIN DAVENPORT, Mr. CLAIRBORNE, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. JOHN BROWN, and Mr. TALIAFERRO, be a committee, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, for the purpose expressed in the third resolution.

H. OF R.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which, together with the letter accompanying the same, was read and referred to the committee last appointed, and is as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives :

The letter herewith transmitted, will inform you that it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life our excellent fellow-citizen GEORGE WASHINGTON, by the purity of his character, and a long series of services to his country, rendered illustrious through the world. It remains for an affectionate and grateful People, in whose hearts he can never die, to pay suitable honor to his memory.

UNITED STATES, Dec. 19, 1799.

"MOUNT VERNON, Dec. 15, 1799.

"SIR: It is with inexpressible grief that I have to announce to you the death of the great and good General WASHINGTON. He died last evening, between ten and eleven o'clock, after a short illness of about twenty hours. His disorder was an inflammatory sore throat, which proceeded from a cold, of which he made but little complaint on Friday. On Saturday morning, about three o'clock, he became ill. Doctor Craik attended him in the morning, and Doctor Dick, of Alexandria, and Doctor Brown, of Port Tobacco, were soon after called in. Every medical assistance was offered, but without the desired effect. His last scene corresponded with the whole tenor of his life; not a groan, nor a complaint, escaped him in extreme distress. With perfect resignation, and in full possession of his reason, he closed his well spent life."

"I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant.

* FROM AN ALEXANDRIA PAPER OF DECEMBER 21, 1799.

Messrs. J. & J. D. Westcott:

Presuming that some account of the late illness and death of General WASHINGTON, will be generally interesting, and particularly so to the professors and practitioners of medicine throughout America, we request you to publish the following statement.

JAMES CRAIK,
ELISHA C. DICK.

Some time in the night of Friday, the 13th inst., having been exposed to a rain on the preceding day, General WASHINGTON was attacked with an inflammatory affection of the upper part of the windpipe, called, in technical language, cynanche trachealis. The disease commenced with a violent ague, accompanied with some pain in the upper and fore part of the throat, a sense of stricture in the same part, a cough and a difficult rather than a painful deglutition, which were soon succeeded by fever and a quick and laborious respiration. The necessity of blood-letting suggesting itself to the General, he procured a bleeder in the neighborhood, who took from his arm, in the night, twelve or fourteen ounces of blood. He would not by any means be prevailed upon by the family to send for the attending physician till the following morning, who arrived at Mount Vernon at about eleven o'clock on Saturday. Discovering the case to be highly alarming, and foreseeing the fatal tendency of the disease, two consulting physicians were immediately sent for, who arrived, one at half after three, the other at four o'clock in the afternoon. In the interim were employed two copious bleedings, a blister was applied to the part affected, two moderate doses of calomel were given, and an injection was administered, which operated on the lower intestines—but all without any perceptible advantage; the respiration becoming still more difficult and distressing.

Upon the arrival of the first of the consulting physicians, it was agreed, as there were yet no signs of accumulation in the bronchial vessels of the lungs, to try the result of another bleeding, when tional calamity, reported that the committee had according to order, performed that service, and that the President signified to them it would be convenient for him to receive this House at one o'clock this afternoon, at his own house.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution passed by the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses to report measures suitable to the occasion, and expressive of the profound sorrow with which Congress is penetrated on the loss of a citizen, first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen; and have appointed Mr. DAYTON, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. GUNN, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. TRACY, a committee on their part.

The SPEAKER, attended by the House, then withdrew to the house of the President of the United States, when Mr. SPEAKER addressed the President as follows:

SIR: The House of Representatives, penetrated with a sense of the irreparable loss sustained by the nation in the death of that great and good man, the illustrious and beloved WASHINGTON, wait on you, sir, to express their condolence on this melancholy and distressing event.

To which the PRESIDENT replied as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives :

I receive, with great respect and affection, the condolence of the House of Representatives, on the melancholy and affecting event, in the death of the most illustrious and beloved personage which this country ever produced. I sympathize with you, with the nation, and with good men through the world, in this irreparable loss sustained by us all.

about thirty-two ounces of blood were drawn, without the smallest apparent alleviation of the disease. Vapors of vinegar and water were frequently inhaled, ten grains of calomel were given, succeeded by repeated doses of emetic tartar, amounting in all to five or six grains, with no other effect than a copious discharge from the bowels. The powers of life seemed now manifestly yielding to the force of the disorder. Blisters were applied to the extremities, together with a cataplasm of bran and vinegar to the throat. Speaking, which was painful from the beginning, now became almost impracticable; respiration grew more and more contracted and imperfect, till half after eleven o'clock on Saturday night; when, retaining the full possession of his intellect, he expired, without a struggle.

He was fully impressed at the beginning of his complaint, as well as through every succeeding stage of it, that its conclusion would be mortal; submitting to the several exertions made for his recovery rather as a duty, than from any expectation of their efficacy. He considered the operations of death upon his system as coeval with the disease; and several hours before his decease, after repeated efforts to be understood, succeeded in expressing a desire that he might be permitted to die without interruption.

During the short period of his illness, he economized his time in the arrangement of such few concerns as required his attention, with the utmost serenity, and anticipated his approaching dissolution with every demonstration of that equanimity, for which his whole life has been so uniformly and singularly conspicuous.

DECEMBER, 1799.

NIS, from Maryland; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. ORRIS from the select committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, reported the bill with sundry amendments, which were committed to a Committee of the whole House for Friday.

Mr. SEWALL presented a letter of Winthrop Sargent, Esq., Governor of the Mississippi Territory, to the Secretary of State, enclosing two memorials of the inhabitants of the Natchez—the first praying for Legislative aid to assist them in the establishment of a seminary, and places of public worship; the second for a confirmation of their titles to lands occupied by them previous to the cession of the Territory to the United States by Spain, and that vacant lands may be granted, free of expense, to persons on their becoming actual settlers. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RUTLEDGE presented a petition of Nicholas I. Roosevelt, on behalf of himself and associates, praying for an act of incorporation for the purpose of continuing and facilitating the works of Schuyler's Copper Mine, in New Jersey; which was read and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A petition of Thomas Burling and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, in behalf of themselves and the people of the said Territory, was presented to the House and read, praying the confirmation of all grants of lands legally and justly obtained from the Spanish Government, prior to the ratification of the late treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty.

Also, a petition of John Henderson, and others, inhabitants of the Natchez, in the said Territory, praying the aid and patronage of Congress in the establishment of a regular ministry of the Gospel among them, and of schools for the education of their youth.

Ordered, That the said petitions do lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of a number of inhabitants of the United States, residing near the Ohio, who had purchased a quantity of land from John Cleves Symmes, the title to which had been abrogated by the act of Congress of the 30th September, 1794, praying for a repeal of that act; or permission to retain the lands which they have improved, at a fair valuation; or that a hearing may be given them in the courts of law.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. GREGG moved, that the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the petition of Robert Sturgeon, be discharged from the further consideration thereof; and that it be referred to the select committee to whom was committed the bill from the Senate for relief of persons imprisoned for debt. Agreed to.

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the joint committee appointed to report what testimony of respect ought to be paid to the memory of the man first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, made a report in part, which he delivered in at the table, where it was twice read, and unanimously agreed to, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a marble monument be erected by the United States, in the Capitol, in the city of Washington, and that the family of General WASHINGTON be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life.

And be it further resolved, That there be a funeral procession from Congress Hall to the German Lutheran Church, in honor of the memory of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, on Thursday the 26th instant, and that an oration be prepared at the request of Congress, to be delivered before both Houses on that day, and that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be desired to request one of the members of Congress to prepare and deliver the same.

And be it further resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be transmitted to Mrs. WASHINGTON, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character; of their condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence; and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, in the manner expressed in the first resolution.

*And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to issue a proclamation, notifying to the people throughout the United States, the recommendation contained in the third resolution.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolutions to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

*The following orders were issued by the War and Navy Departments:

The PRESIDENT, with deep regret, announces to the Army the death of its beloved Chief, General GEORGE WASHINGTON. Sharing in the grief which every heart must feel for so heavy and afflicting a public loss, and desirous to express his high sense of the vast debt of gratitude which is due to the virtues, talents, and ever memorable services of the illustrious deceased, he directs that funeral honors be paid to him at all the military stations, and that the officers of the army and of the several corps of volunteers wear crape on the left arm, by way of mourning, for six months. Major General Hamilton will give the necessary orders for carrying into effect the foregoing directions.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in Philadelphia, this nineteenth day of December, A. D. 1799, and in the twenty-fourth year of the independence of the said States.

By command of the President: JAMES M'HENRY,
Secretary of War.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, 20th December, 1799.

The PRESIDENT, with deep affliction, announces to the Navy, and to the marines, the death of our beloved fellow-citizen, GEORGE WASHINGTON, Commander of our Armies, and late President of the United States; but rendered more illustrious by his eminent virtues, and a long series of the most important services, than by the honors which his grateful country delighted to confer upon him.

Desirous that the Navy and marines should express, in common with every other description of American citizens, the high sense which all feel of the loss our country has sustained in the death of this good and great man, the PRESIDENT directs that the vessels of the Navy, in our own and foreign ports, be put in mourning for one week, by wearing their colors half-mast high; and that the officers of the Navy and of the marines wear crape on the left arm, below the elbow, for six months. Previous to the question being put upon the first resolution, Mr. H. LEE, of Virginia, rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: In executing the task assigned to the committee, it will be observed much remains to be done; so far as they have gone, and as far as they may go, one hope is cherished, that whatever is done, will be unanimously adopted.

This will be most pleasing to our constituents, and most honorable to the character we all honor. Out of a wish to execute in the best manner the direction of the House, a difference of opinion will naturally prevail. This difference of opinion, however commendable, upon ascertaining the mode of public mourning, ought to be suppressed when we come to act; for unanimity then is, as I before stated, most to be wished for, whether the feelings of our constituents, or our intentions, on the celebrity which all desire to give to the high occasion, govern.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing their concurrence in the report of the joint committee made this day; and then the House adjourned till to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, December 24.

Ordered, That the petitions of John Henderson and others, and of Thomas Burling and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, presented yesterday, be referred to Messrs. SEWALL, CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, WALN, EVANS and HILL; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine and report what laws have expired, or are near expiring, and require to be revived or further continued, made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORDON moved the following resolution, which was adopted by the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to the act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, the above resolution was committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NORTHWESTERN LAND SALES.

Mr. HARRISON said, he conceived the system which had been adopted for the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio was capable of considerable improvement; and that alterations might be made in the existing laws on that subject, which would be of considerable benefit to persons becoming actual settlers of that country. He therefore moved the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary in the laws authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the Ohio, and report to the House their opinion thereon.

The resolution was agreed to, and Messrs HARRISON, BRACE, GORDON, DAVIS, GORE, LYMAN, and GALLATIN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GALLATIN presented a petition of 176 actual settlers, of the county of Jefferson, in the Northwestern Territory, praying that a law may be passed authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States in such manner as they may become purchasers, and thereby prevent land speculators from becoming the proprietors of the ground which they had improved, and to which they ought to have the pre-emption, which they could not have under the existing laws. Referred to the committee to whom were committed Mr. HARRISON's resolution.

PETITION OF GEORGE FARRAGUT.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved, that the petition of George Farragut, presented at the last session, with the report of the Secretary of War made thereon, be referred to a select committee.

This motion was objected to, on the ground that the petition contained a claim upon the United States; and that as a standing committee had been appointed by the rules of the House, for considering and reporting upon all claims of the nature contained in this petition, it would be improper to deviate in one instance from the rule; as it must tend to the appointment of select committees whenever members who present similar petitions might wish the report upon them to be expedited. Mr. MACON therefore moved that it be referred to the Committee of Claims; which was agreed to.

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER informed the House that, conformably to the resolution of Congress, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives had requested Major General HENRY LEE, one of the Representatives from the State of Virginia, to prepare and deliver a funeral oration before both Houses, on Thursday, the twenty-sixth instant, in honor of the memory of GEORGE WASHINGTON, late General of the Armies of the United States; and that Mr. LEE had been pleased to accept of the appointment.

And, on motion, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 26.

This being the day appointed by the resolution of Congress for the funeral procession in honor of the memory of GEORGE WASHINGTON, late General of the Armies of the United States, the House proceeded to the German Lutheran Church, where they attended the funeral oration, prepared and delivered on the occasion by Major General LEE, one of the members of this House for the State of Virginia. [See Appendix.]

The House, having returned, adjourned until to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, December 27.

JOHN FOWLER, from Kentucky, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of Samuel Selby, 3d, late Collector of the Revenue in the fourth division of the second survey of the District of Maryland, now confined in the prison of Allegany county, in the said State, was presented to the House and read, praying to be relieved from the confinement to which he is subjected, in consequence of his having converted to his own use moneys which he received as Collector as aforesaid, and is unable to refund.

Also a petition of Lawrence Erb, late Collector of the Revenue of the United States within the county of Northampton, in the State of Pennsylvania, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for relief of persons imprisoned for debt."

A petition of John Smith, and others, inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory, was presented to the House and read, praying a repeal or amendment of the laws authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the Ohio; and that they may be allowed to purchase lands of the United States, on terms and in quantities suitable to their circumstances.

Also a petition of James Grubb, and others, inhabitants of the said Territory, to the same effect.

Also, a petition of Andrew Small, and others, inhabitants of the Territory aforesaid, and actual settlers upon lands purchased of John C. Symmes, praying for a revision and amendment of the acts authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and that they may be allowed to retain the possession of the said lands upon terms more favorable and better suited to their situation than those contemplated by the said acts.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Navy on the petition of sundry French officers confined in the prison of Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, referred to him on the eighteenth instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;" and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress; and on the question that the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on the said bill, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House be discharged therefrom, and that the said bill be recommitted to the committee appointed, on the fifth instant, to inquire whether it be expedient to make any, and, if any, what provision for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt.

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution, to wit:

"The House of Representatives of the United States, highly gratified with the manner in which Mr. LEE has performed the service assigned to him under the resolution desiring the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to request one of the members of Congress to prepare and deliver a funeral oration on the death of GEORGE WASHINGTON; and desirous of communicating to their fellow-citizens, through the medium of the press, those sentiments of respect for the character, of gratitude for the services, and of grief for the death of that illustrious personage, which, felt by all, have, on this melancholy occasion, been so well expressed:

"Resolved, That the SPEAKER present the thanks of this House to Mr. LEE, for the oration delivered by him to both Houses of Congress on Thursday, the twenty-sixth instant; and request that he will permit a copy thereof to be taken for publication."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the same, and unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

MONDAY, December 30.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee to whom was re-committed the bill from the Senate for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, reported the same, with amendments; which was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

ENUMERATION OF INHABITANTS.

Mr. OTIS called for the order of the day on the bill to provide for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. The House accordingly went into a Committee of the Whole on said bill; Mr. PARKER in the Chair. The first section of the bill begins thus:

"Be it enacted &c., That the Marshals of the several districts of the United States, and the Secretaries of the Territory of the United States, Northwest of the river Ohio, and of the Mississippi Territory, respectively, shall be and are hereby authorized and required, under the direction of the Secretary of State, and according to such instructions as he shall give pursuant to this act, to cause the number of the inhabitants within their respective districts and territories to be taken," &c.

The first section having been read, Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the words printed in italic. Mr. N. said this provision was not to be found in the former act on this subject; and he saw no reason why a man who was bound by a solemn oath to act in conformity to this act, should be subject to directions which the scrupulousness of his conscience might lead him to refuse to abide by.

Mr. OTIS thought it necessary the power of giving directions pursuant to this act, should be lodged somewhere—he was indifferent whether with the Secretary of State or any other proper officer; in order that if any difficulty or embarrassment arose in the execution of the law, the Marshals, who were to execute it, would know where to apply. It was also necessary the returns should be uniform, which could not be expected to be the case were the words struck out. The question was put, when there appeared in the affirmative 36, negative 41.

DECEMBER, 1799.

Census of the United States.

H. OF R.

The bill having been gone through, and the blanks therein filled up, the Committee rose, and reported the same. When

Mr. CHRISTIE renewed the motion made in the Committee by Mr. NICHOLAS. He said he was so impressed with the necessity of erasing the words, as to impel him to wish a reconsideration of the subject; for it was not his wish or intention to vote for a law that should give a controlling power to any particular officer of the Government over the law, which he conceived the Secretary of State would completely enjoy, were the words to remain in the bill. He would be sorry to harbor the thought that that officer would throw any impediment in the way of the law, but he thought it improper to entrust him with a power to do it.

Mr. GRISWOLD, said, it certainly was a mere matter of form and custom, and necessarily the business of an officer of State, for questions would unavoidably arise in which instructions must come, as to the execution of the law, from the Secretary of State or the President. From the first section, it would appear that certain interrogatories were necessary to be made to the heads of families, as, Who are the persons residing in the house? What their ages, names? &c. These interrogatories must be provided by some department of the Government, or the Marshals and their assistants would not know how to proceed on the business allotted to them. In order to prevent confusion and to establish a uniformity throughout the districts, it was very necessary to put this power in the Secretary of State.

Mr. NICHOLAS said his principal objection to the words before was, because they established an operation which he could not understand; but, from the explanation of the gentleman last up, he feared the operation was worse than he had suspected. The gentleman said that a particular section of the law was not sufficient of itself, but wanted the explanation of the Secretary of State to ascertain its operation, and his direction, by prescribing the interrogatories to come at facts requisite; and he supposed, of course, that the Secretary of State may have it in his power to determine what facts shall make a residence necessary for insertion in the schedule. He would ask the House, whether they were not giving, out of their own hands, a power which none but the Legislature ought to possess? Was it the way to recommend the insertion of the words, by saying that it was necessary to lodge the discretion somewhere? Surely, this proved that the law was not right, and therefore was sufficient to excite a doubt as to the propriety of its operation. Mr. N. thought, if there were no other reasons to be urged against inserting the words, it would be enough that they had not been introduced into the former law, and no injuries had occurred for the want of them. It was sufficient time to amend, or insert new provisions in a law, when its former operation was found inadequate to its object. The former law never had such a provision: the present law was in every other respect made as precise as was possible; the schedule of return was accurately and distinctly marked as to the descriptions of persons; and surely none were so able to say what constituted actual residence as the Marshal, but, if he should be thought incompetent, the law might be made to go further, and mark precisely the mode of its own operations.

Mr. OTIS was surprised at the perseverance of the gentleman in his opposition to the words. It appears to be taken for granted that the Secretary of State has power to vary the law, whereas it was merely a declaratory power that was given him, and to say how it ought to be executed. It was not a new power given to the departments of the Government; the same was left with the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting another law, and those powers were necessarily left, because it was impossible for the Legislature to foresee all the occurrences which would arise, and which would be various in various parts. It is the business of the departments of Government to see that the laws are executed, which power only these words delegate.

Besides, whatever instructions the Secretary of State would have power to give must be "pursuant to this act." If the law itself is sufficiently precise, as the gentleman supposes, then no instructions will be necessary, but this will not be the case everywhere. This was the idea of the committee who reported the bill, and in order to meet all difficulties that might occur, they introduced these words and the eighth section, which reads thus:

"The Secretary of State shall be, and hereby is, authorized and required to adopt and communicate to the Marshals of the several States, and to the Secretaries aforesaid, proper regulations and instructions for carrying this act into effect, and also the forms of schedule to be returned and interrogatories to be administered by the several persons who shall be employed therein."

Mr. OTIS said it was thought these regulations would much facilitate the labor of the officers employed, and enable them to attain the facts with considerable less difficulty.

Mr. GALLATIN said the object in introducing this new provision appeared to him to be either to give the Secretary of State power and authority to define some part of the law which was not precise enough to be understood, or it was merely that he should direct some certain provision of it to be carried into effect.

If, as was insinuated by a gentleman, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) it was to give a discretionary power to that officer to define any law or part of a law which was not clear enough, he must say it was not the province of any officer in the Government whatever, but such definition ought to be included in the law itself, or it would be imperfect. He supposed, as was observed, that this definition might be seen requisite in the fifth section as to what was meant by "inhabitants," so that all might be included, and none twice enumerated whom accident might throw into different parts of the United States. It was necessary to have a better definition than was provided by the Constitution; he took it to be the duty of the House to do it; they must declare it, and not leave it to the Secretary of State or to the Marshals, who are only to carry the law into effect. If it is taken out of the hands of the Marshals, and placed with the Secretary of State, then the remedy is not adequate to the evil, because he cannot be so competent to it as the Marshals.

H. OF R.

Census of the United States.

DECEMBER, 1799.

If, on the other hand, the meaning of the word "inhabitant" is precise enough in itself, and no explanation is necessary, and the object is merely a regulation as to the questions it may be necessary to ask, then it is better to leave it with the Marshal, for he can best know whether all and no more are enumerated, he being an inhabitant of the district and more acquainted with it. The Marshal is sworn to "enumerate all the inhabitants in his district, to the best of his abilities," and surely there can be no necessity to shackle him with directions which must issue, not from the law he is executing, but from the office of the Secretary of State. The eighth section, Mr. GALLATIN observed, went further, and in a manner gave power to the Secretary of State to alter the first section. The first section pointed out the necessary schedule, but the eighth section gave some power concerning that schedule to the Secretary, to "adopt and communicate the forms of schedule to be returned," &c., which, being inconsistent with any former mode, he conceived was highly improper.

The object of taking the enumeration was to conform the representation in Congress to the number of inhabitants; the people wished it done, and Congress ought to do it fairly; and in forming a bill to effect it, all suspicion ought to be removed from the minds of the public, that it would be done contrary: but if the power of regulating the enumeration was placed in the Secretary of State, who might be supposed to possess some local adherence and favor towards his own State—if it was recollected that there was no such provision before, and yet the law was well executed—was not the measure calculated to breed suspicion? The forms of return and directions being ample in a general view, he hoped no new provision would be introduced.

Mr. GORDON said the objections made to the controlling power of the Secretary of State were of a nature not to be answered, because those objections were merely of suspicion; but to those who wished to look at the reasonableness of the words, and who harbored no suspicion, a few arguments might be offered which he thought must carry conviction.

The propriety of having some person to superintend had been well argued, but more reasons might be offered for its necessity. It was a possible event (and against such, provisions ought to be made) that a Marshal might die, resign, or be removed from office, before the completion of the act, and yet the enumeration in that district might be begun; in such case, what provision was there to complete those returns, or to examine into deficiencies? By placing it in the hands of the Secretary of State there will be no danger of this difficulty. That this power should be vested in some officer who should have a general superintendence to remove all objections and impediments he thought self-evident, and with none, in his opinion, could it be so properly placed as the Secretary of State.

Mr. LEE said, he had some doubts as to the propriety of these words, and he would vote for their expulsion; and he must confess that the farther discussion of the subject, had not removed those doubts, but rather strengthened them. If the sole object contemplated by the gentlemen who argued for the necessity of the words was merely that there should be some head, for conducting, in point of form and uniformity, the execution of the law, then these words, or some other more definite, should be preserved; but as the bill now stood, while it held up that object, it carried with it material and substantial objections. What, he asked, would be the result under the law, if a Marshal, attending to the just warning of his conscience, should say to the Secretary of State "Your instructions, if executed by me, in my judgment, would violate my oath; and my conscientious adherence to the directions of the law must be a prominent rule for my conduct?" Thus during the dispute between the Secretary of State and the conscientious officer, on account of the elapsing of the Constitutional period for enumeration, a whole State would lose its representation to the National Legislature! He would not suppose that its occurrence would happen from political motives, but purity of conscience may prevent the execution of the office, and as that could possibly take place it must appear a very material inconvenience, and the benefits of a wise and necessary law would be not only lost, but the result be evil.

The law would therefore be incomplete as it respected the instructions of the Secretary of State, and if the sole object was uniformity of system, a discretion would be given which may be used very detrimentally to a part of the community, though perhaps not willingly. He wished that some gentleman would remove those doubts by showing, either that there was no foundation for them, or else by so qualifying the law, while the discretion was given, as to prove that the sole object was the professed one, to wit, that all the Marshals through this extensive Republic should be governed by a fixed rule with respect to form; until which he could not vote for the clause.

Mr. EGGLESTON suggested the propriety of striking out the words, and again committing the bill to the whole House for an amendment, suitable to the opinions of the member last up.

Mr. GRISWOLD said the same words were passed through the House last session in the enumeration bill. The Secretary of State was as much restricted as the Marshal himself, for he could not give instructions otherwise than "pursuant to this act." Why there should be objections to the Secretary's using this power, and no objection be made to the exercise of it by the Marshals, he could not imagine. He did not conceive the act was indefinite, as had been said; the act was sufficiently certain and precise, but the mode of execution was so uncertain that a discretionary power must be placed somewhere. If it was left with the Marshals, there was danger of some persons being twice returned; suppose, for instance, an inhabitant of Delaware resided for a time in Pennsylvania, his return might have been made in Delaware, and again in Pennsylvania, because it was in the hands of two different Marshals, whereas if left with the Secretary of State, this evil would be avoided.

Mr. LEE could not but suspect there was more than "mere matter of form" intended by the introduction of this new principle in the broad words in which it was comprised, "under the direction of the Secretary of State"—broader words could not be found in the English language. The Secretary of State being placed paramount to the Marshal, the Marshaling conscientiously would disobey the Secretary of State rather than his conscience; what would then be his mode of acting under this imperious mandate? Mr. L. said he looked with a jealous eye upon every law coming from the Legislature, lest it should be improperly used by Executive authority. This was a Constitutional duty. The wisdom and genius of our Government, as well as the feelings of our people, alike made it necessary to keep the Executive and the Legislative power separate, for on this our safety depended; but here was the Executive power brought in to aid the Legislative. We doubt, said he; are we not to realize these doubts by supposing they may take place in this extensive community? Thus situated, the people will charge us with what we all disclaim—that we mean to give a power to the Executive authority over our laws. If we desire to escape this suspicion, we should make our laws in themselves explicit, and not give any discretionary power as to their execution elsewhere.

Mr. DANA said, that the discussion which this subject had undergone had decided him in the opinion that the words ought not to be stricken out. The whole execution of the laws was entrusted to Executive officers, and they were to execute those laws uniformly throughout the United States. The construction was wrong to suppose that this influence was improper, because the President or Secretary of State should think this or that a proper way of executing it; and the argument was weak that a particular local attachment would be used. It was no more improper that the Secretary of State should have his particular bias, even if he should make use of it, than that a Marshal should have his particular bias. This, in his view, instead of operating against the measure, was a decisive argument in its favor, in order that the bias of a number should not be left to act so variously as they naturally would, but upon uniform principles. It would not have done to have left that power in the hands of that officer if he was not to be restricted to the meaning of the act, but with this restriction it was necessary.

Mr. OTIS said his great desire to have this law carried into beneficial execution induced him to be averse to striking out the words, for unless they remained, in vain might the Legislature expect any accurate census to be made at any future period. If the particular form of a schedule was to be made by the different Marshals and there were no provisions to be made by law, by which to consolidate them into one regular return, how would they be understood, or who know the result? Different would be the forms of returns; some would be more, and some less intelligible; they must all be sent to the Secretary of State; that officer must, without a law or instructions, reduce them into a form at a great expense; whereas it ought to be provided in the law that they may be more readily reduced to form, and this was done by the discretion given to that officer. Farther, the assistants to the Marshal, many of them young men, and inexperienced, would have to ascertain facts about which they had no instructions, as, what is the name of the head of the family? how many reside in this house? &c.

Nor was this a new principle, as contended by some gentlemen. He instanced the act for the relief of American seamen, respecting whom the collectors at the different ports had to transmit a report once in three months, for which the Secretary gives instructions how to make out the abstract. It was similar in the Treasury Department, and in all cases where it was necessary to make a general provision, it was the practice of the Head of the Department to give directions.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. LEE) that there was danger in taking the instructions of the Secretary and of the Marshals. If the conscientious Marshal should still go on and conform to the law, all the facts must appear in the Department of State, and would be submitted to the Legislature for inspection, and it would be in the power of the House to say whether the Marshal or the Secretary of State was wrong: whether or not he had conformed to the law. Therefore, in the event, it would be in his power to do his duty notwithstanding the contrary instructions he might receive, and the House would decide the matter with strict justice.

Mr. JONES thought, as had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, that these words conveyed too much power to the Department of State, besides it was not the province of any Executive officer to construe the laws. Laws, after they passed, were generally referred to the Judiciary department of the Government for construction; once out of the hands of the Legislature and they were no longer in their power; but this high and solemn power ought not to be entrusted to the Secretary of State, because it was not a part of his business, and might materially involve the interests of the community. Under this extensive clause the Secretary of State might establish a rule which may operate very severely upon some parts of the United States, and his regulations and instructions were made absolutely final. The gentleman last up thought that the House could determine upon the conduct of the Secretary of State, but had they not the same power over the Marshal's return? The Marshals, if the words were stricken out, would exercise their own judgments, and when the returns were made to the House, they could determine whether they would militate against the interest of any particular parts of the United States or not, and it would be with that House to say how far these returns should operate on the apportionment of representation. He hoped it was not the disposition of the Legislature of this country to throw this increase of power into the hands of any department, however much that department might merit and obtain confidence.

That this law must be under the direction of some one department of the Government, in order to obtain a uniform operation, he admitted was necessary: this might be done by a clause in the law authorizing the Secretary of State, or some other officer of Government, to forward to the Marshals and Secretaries, exemplified copies of the act and schedule; this would make the operation uniform. To effect this the words might be struck out, and the whole of the 11th section, and the direction, incorporated into the act. It appeared to be the general sense of the House that the instructions should be uniform; this was the most that gentlemen on the other side contended for; he therefore supposed they would agree to some such mode as that.

Mr. EDMOND thought the words ought not to be struck out, for, unless they were retained, there certainly would not be an uniform return. Where the execution of a law was entrusted to a great variety of hands, there must necessarily be a difference in their returns, unless by the intervention of some general instruction they were made uniform. Gentlemen appeared to be jealous of the power they were delegating, but surely it was a necessary power. They seemed to forget that there were other officers to be employed in this business besides the Marshals; assistants were to be appointed by sixteen different tribunals; in some States the number of assistants would be more, in some less. As the Marshals could not dictate to the "consciences" of their assistants, (for they must give them instructions,) would they not be subjected to as much difficulty as was supposed might exist between the Secretary of State and the Marshals? If the Marshals were left to instruct their assistants, each might give different directions, and the consequence would be that sixteen different modes would be brought to the House.

The Secretary of State, as it now stands, undertakes to prescribe to the Marshal a certain mode for the execution of the law; if the Marshal should conceive that prescription required more than the law pointed out, he would not execute it thereby; but by the law. On the other hand, if the prescription does not point out as much as the law, he will certainly still act as the law directs; neither result would lessen the information he might think it necessary to obtain. If the provision remained, perhaps twelve out of sixteen might think the mode established by the Secretary right, and so far there would be uniformity. This would be the most likely way, he thought, to produce it; and sure he was that nothing would control the conscience of the Marshal, for, after all the instructions, he must be governed by his oath.

Mr. RUTLEDGE believed that, if in every stage of proceeding in this very difficult business, the mode of executing the law was not prescribed, the law could not be carried into effect during the ten years the Constitution had pointed out. There appeared to him to be an unfounded jealousy harbored by gentlemen, which must be removed by a due attention to the law, and the necessary circumstances of it. The direction was entrusted, where difficulty should occur, to the Secretary of State. Did not all the gentlemen know, that when difficulties occurred to the inferior officers, employed in the execution of all laws, they must be removed by the Heads of the Department to which they were attached? Thus in the direct tax, the Secretary of the Treasury prescribed the mode of its operation—but when that power was given, it was not even suggested, nor was it ever experienced, that he exercised any control over the law itself; he only directed the form and manner of filling the schedule, and this power was delegated that the return might be accurate and uniform, and this uniformity was indispensable.

Gentlemen coming into the House in this stage of the debate would conceive, from the opposition made to these words, that the House were about to invest the Secretary of State with full control over the law. Although the motion was so strongly enforced, yet no gentlemen had pretended to say that the Secretary possessed any controlling power over the law, but they were jealous of a power which could not be executed; yet those gentlemen allowed that the instructions must come from somewhere. It appeared to him, Mr. R. said, that the whole alarm was by shadow, and upon a complete investigation it would appear that the substance did not, nor ever would, exist. He said he had attended minutely to the argument, wishing to be convinced of the impropriety of the words moved to be stricken out, if there existed any, but he was not convinced of any, nor could he conceive how anything else could be substituted to answer the purpose contended for. These difficulties would never be dispelled nor the law put into execution if the Marshals were to come to the House and ask information. The only effectual way, in his opinion, to get the law executed was by entrusting the instructions with the proper department—the Secretary of State.

Mr. MACON could not conceive how the effect supposed by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) could be produced for a want of this provision, to wit, the non-execution of the law in the ten years. It could not have that effect, nor was the suspicion warranted by experience. The former law had none of these words, but was well executed, and the case which occurred in South Carolina was not from that cause. It appeared to him that the House were giving up the benefit of experience, merely for the sake of novelty. The return and apportionment were made under the former law without difficulty, or complaint of irregularity in the proceeding.

The case stated by the gentleman from Virginia was possible, and if an injury could possibly occur therefrom it must be felt by every part of the Union, which ought not to be hazarded by any new introductions, the beneficial effects of which could not be known. It may be useful, or it may not. To put it on its best footing, therefore, as there was a possibility of inconvenience from the different constructions of the law, it would be wise to avoid that part of the law which would produce that uncertainty, especially as no great necessity for that part was contended for. If, as was thought by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. EDMOND,) there should arise a difference between the Marshals and their deputies, the remedy would be easy, for the Marshal could easily displace his deputy.

Mr. CRAIK said he had heard no gentleman argue in favor of giving the Secretary of State any control, in substance, over this act; the only difference of opinion appeared to be as to the mode of obtaining the principal objects of the bill, for all agree that some general superintendence was necessary, to act as a control over the officer who should execute the law. The words appeared to him to be nothing more than a designation of that control. If gentlemen were desirous of defining what the directions of the Secretary of State should be, he should have no objection to its introduction into the bill. He should therefore be in favor of the words remaining, and of any addition to the amount stated to be made to the 8th section.

Mr. REED observed, that it having repeatedly been argued that there were no inconveniences in the execution of the former law, he thought it necessary to rise and inform the House that it was not the case, and there was not that uniformity gentlemen conceived. In some of the divisions, while executing the old law, deputies went into all the houses, while others went into scarcely any, but made their inquiries of other persons. He thought at that time it was a great grievance, and some provision was necessary to compel more uniformity and accuracy. From this and other reasons which had been adduced, he hoped the words would remain.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the provisions of the bill were so express, and the directions to the Marshals so explicit, that he was at a loss to conceive where any want of uniformity could possibly originate. Some gentlemen had told the House that certain interrogatories should be devised by the Secretary of State, and issued by him to the Marshals, to be put to householders. It appeared to him that the law had already designated those interrogatories, in the first section, which were to be put by the assistants; they were there informed what was the information wanted; into what division of persons they were to make their lists, &c.; and it required no great foresight in them to know what questions to ask, whereby to come at those facts which were precisely stated as their duty. The business could not be executed better, if put under the superintendence of the Secretary of State. How could he remedy an evil which their oath would not prevent? For by their oath they were to make "a just and perfect enumeration and description of all the persons resident within their respective divisions." He could not conceive what reason operated now to make these words necessary which did not at the formation of the former act, since no evidence had been adduced of its incompetency. Every Marshal would take a copy of the schedule required, and it would operate on their duty uniformly, and if that uniformity was not attainable by the law, it could not be by the Secretary of State.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and the motion negatived—39 to 45, as follows:

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER informed the House that, in pursuance of the resolution of Friday last, he had addressed to Major General HENRY LEE, one of the members for the State of Virginia, the following letter:

"PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 27, 1799.

"DEAR SIR: The enclosed resolutions, which unanimously passed the House of Representatives this day, will make known to you how highly they have been gratified with the manner in which you have performed the service assigned to you, in preparing and delivering a funeral oration on the death of General WASHINGTON. That our constituents may participate in the gratification we have received, from your having so well expressed those sentiments of respect for the character, of gratitude for the services, and of grief for the death of that illustrious personage, I flatter myself you will not hesitate to comply with the request of the House, by furnishing a copy of your oration, to be taken for publication.

"Allow me, while performing this pleasing task of official duty in communicating an act of the Representatives of the People, so just to you and so honorable to themselves, to embrace the opportunity to declare that I am, personally, with great esteem and sincere regard, dear sir, your friend and obedient servant,

"THEODORE SEDGWICK.

"The Hon. Maj. Gen. LEE."

To which Mr. LEE had replied as follows:

"HENRY LEE.

"The SPEAKER of the House of Reps."

Mr. MARSHALL, from the joint committee appointed to consider and report what measures ought to be adopted in honor of the memory of General WASHINGTON, made another report in part, which was unanimously agreed to by the House, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to assemble on the twenty-second day of February next, in such numbers and manner as may be convenient, publicly to testify their grief for the death of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, by suitable eulogies, orations, and discourses, or by public prayers.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to recommend the same, by a proclamation for that purpose.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolutions to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

TUESDAY, December 31.

ENUMERATION OF INHABITANTS.

The bill providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, was read the third time; and, on the question of its passage,

Mr. PAGE rose and moved its reconsideration in a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of making the following amendment at the end of the eighth section.

"Provided That the directions, regulations, and instructions, which the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to give to the Marshals of the several States, shall be confined to the forms necessary to be observed by them respectively, in taking the census herein provided for, and making the returns thereof."

It was stated yesterday, he observed, and he believed it to be a fact, that the bill now under consideration contained an important innovation upon the bill formerly passed upon the same subject. Whenever the House are called upon to amend the forms of law, or to make alterations in one which it might be found necessary to renew, it should always be made to appear that great inconveniences attended its former execution. This has not been made to appear, nor have any arguments for the necessity of the new principle, which yesterday passed the House, been introduced. The same officers were mostly now in office, he conceived, who were engaged in the execution of the former law, and there had been no complaints of any difficulty or fault in its execution, from which he concluded the innovation was unnecessary.

Experience was always the best guide in matters of legislation; as therefore no difficulty was formerly found, none could exist under the operation of the same law at present. He objected to the principle, farther, because it furnished a latitude of construction to the Secretary of State which might defeat the salutary effects of the law. It also went to establish a precedent for increasing authority, which the history of mankind forbade, in the numerous evils attendant thereon. New power was generally injurious, and, unless from peremptory necessity, ought never be delegated. In his opinion it was as important a question as could come before the Legislature, because the object of this law was to affect the very sinews of the Republic by affixing its representation, which if wounded would be felt in our dearest interests. From this important view, and to introduce what was declared to be the wish of many, and yet suffer the avowed object of others to remain, in the bill, he thought a short time would be well spent in its reconsideration.

Mr. GRISWOLD thought, from the explanation yesterday given to the bill, and the opportunity gentlemen then had to amend it, there could be no necessity for its reconsideration.

Mr. DANA declared himself perfectly satisfied with the safety of the bill from any undue interposition. Yet, in order to give gentlemen every opportunity of a full and fair discussion, he should vote for the motion.

Mr. NORR said he voted yesterday against striking out the words, as moved, in expectation, from some observations which dropped from several gentlemen, that a motion would be afterwards made to amend the eighth section. It struck him at that time, and he was still of opinion, that the provisions of the bill ought to be superintended by the Secretary of State, but that some inconveniences wanted removing. Being disappointed in that expectation, he hoped the bill would be re-committed.

On the question for the bill generally to be re-committed to the whole House, the motion was negatived—yeas 37, nays 39.

Mr. CHRISTIE then asked whether it was in order to recommit a particular part. After a few observations as to the point of order, the SPEAKER giving his opinion that it was in order, Mr. C. moved a reconsideration of the eighth section.

Mr. RUTLEDGE declared himself in favor of the motion; not because he was dissatisfied with the bill as it stood, for he hoped no alteration would take place, but because a member had voted for retaining certain words in expectation that an amendment would afterwards take place in the eighth section. He wished a full discussion, and should be sorry to do anything that looked like entrapping any member. He said, he voted against the general reconsideration, because the ground of debate would be renewed, and the time of the House lost, but on this single section the ground would be exceedingly narrow.

Mr. THATCHER said the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) was certainly mistaken in his idea of "entrapping," because the bill had been open to any amendment, but none was introduced; from which it was just to infer none would be; and as the bill then passed to engrossing without even a motion to the contrary, he hoped no reconsideration would be allowed.

Mr. JONES observed, that in the former debate, gentlemen seemed astonished at the alarm entertained by the members who were in the minority. As to himself, he said, he was not alarmed on account of this bill alone, for he did not suppose the Secretary would disgrace his character by taking any injurious steps, even if he had the power; but he was alarmed to see any power vested in any department that was unusual; not on account of this particular power vested in this particular Secretary of State. But, could he have been easy at the present moment as to this innovation, he asked whether gentlemen did not now justify an alarm, when they merely wished the introduction of the principle on account of form and not of substance? If only matter of form, what in the name of God could be their objections to say so in the law? Let the bill be recommitted and the alteration be made, and no alarm would exist for a moment. But, when this reluctance was so apparent, to say there was not just cause for alarm was an absurdity. If the words were not intended to have an injurious operation, on which the alarm was built, gentlemen would admit the amendment into the bill to express what they themselves avowed to be their only object. But if they persisted in opposing this explanatory provision, at least the minority were justified in being alarmed. If, therefore, the Secretary was to have no power over the law, then of course his authority would be designated and confined as to the form and tenor of the instructions.

Mr. DANA said, agreeably to his declaration before, he had determined to vote for the reconsideration of the section, until he heard the observations of the gentleman last up; that gentleman having taken up the subject upon such general principles—extending his observations to the great question of Executive power—as to make him desist from that determination. What had Executive power to execute under this act? May not the discretion be as well and properly entrusted to the Secretary of State as to other Executive officers—the Marshals? This question has no kind of relation to any Constitutional principle; but, the discussion having gone upon that ground, Mr. D. said, if he agreed to a reconsideration, it would comprehend him as voting with others in favor of the great alarm, and declaring himself not to know the difference between Executive and Legislative authority, and, therefore, upon the ground which the gentleman had meant to vote for, he was now decidedly against it.

Mr. SMILE was surprised at the attempt of gentlemen to insert an entirely new principle into this law, and that surprise arose from the consideration that the law had operated as well as gentlemen could wish; but, notwithstanding no fault could be found which might reasonably be expected to be mentioned as the ground of its introduction, a principle that never before had existence was inserted! He had no hopes that the former minority would obtain their wish, because it appeared to be determined already, but he hoped the principle would be again opened for discussion.

Gentlemen appeared surprised that suspicion should be felt by any member; for himself, he declared without shame, that he had suspicion, and he believed it well grounded; but it originated in the conduct of gentlemen on the other side of the question, as much as from the words themselves. How far the instructions or regulations of the Secretary of State to the Marshals would extend, could not be ascertained without the introduction of some boundary. Although it had been said that it was only the introduction of a matter of form and not of substance, yet the Secretary could go a great way by the power which the bill committed to him. In his opinion it placed the Marshal, between his oath and the instructions of the Secretary, in the exact situation mentioned yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE.) As this might happen, and as considerable injuries might occur if the power was improperly used, he hoped the section would be recommitted for the necessary amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL was persuaded that there was no member in the House who wished to commit to the Executive officers any power which they did not possess by the Constitution. So far as his own convictions and opinion went, the fears of gentlemen on that head were perfectly void of foundation. But, though he thought so, he should vote for the recommitment, out of that respect which he thought was due to every gentleman. A member supposing the 8th section might be reconsidered, supposing that some amendment might be brought forward, and supposing that his own opinions might be heard, and have their weight with the House, had voted in a manner different from his wish; should not that member be indulged with a reconsideration?

From this consideration, Mr. M. said he felt himself extremely inclined to vote for a reconsideration; and, feeling so, he should not think himself justifiable in being prevented that duty from any observations which should have fallen from another gentleman. Supposing another gentleman did wrong in extending his ideas beyond the precise limits of the question, should that operate as a reason to vote against that motion? In this he differed from his friend from Connecticut (Mr. DANA.) He did not place it upon that ground, and, therefore, should not be deterred from his duty by that consideration.

Mr. NOTT, after expressing his design to rise only where his duty called him, on account of the number of gentlemen of superior talents which he beheld around him, observed that his desire of reconsideration was not on account of any alarm which he felt, because he did not conceive the section gave that extraordinary power to the Executive which was apprehended by some gentlemen; but as it was considered that the power given might extend further than was contemplated by the friends of the bill, in the differences which might exist between the Marshals and the Secretary of State, so as to prevent the execution of the law, although he thought the Marshal ought to be under direction of the Secretary of State, yet he thought an amendment was necessary to define the business assigned. Seeing many gentlemen of the same opinion more able to introduce the amendment, than himself, he had forbore. He conceived that a grammatical error existed in the bill: the form of schedule was particularly marked in the first section, but in the 8th section, the Secretary of State was to direct the form of schedule. There appeared to be a duty where none was requisite, and might cause errors in the returns. However, he did not wish the section to be re-committed merely on account of his misunderstanding.

Mr. OTIS rose to explain the objection respecting the schedule. The one in the first section went merely to direct the secretaries and assistants, but the one to be under the direction of the Secretary of State was the form of an aggregate schedule to be returned by the Marshals into his office.

The argument that the law should not be touched because the provision did not exist in a former law, he thought very weak; it was the first time he had heard objections made to laws being amended upon that ground; if that kind of argument was good, laws would never be amended. Still, faults may exist, which, from various causes, were never pointed out. As he conceived the motion would extend beyond the mere verbal amendment, and the design was again to try the principle, he hoped it would not be reconsidered.

The motion was lost—yeas 41, nays 43.

The bill was then passed without an amendment.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the bill for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, also the bill for allowing salvage in cases of recapture.

These bills were passed by the Committee and by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 1, 1800.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. NICHOLAS rose and observed, that he was so well informed of the necessity the House would be under, in the course of the present session, to find additional supplies to meet the expenses, that it must appear an incumbent duty on every gentleman who wished to provide for that object, to state it in the early part of the session. It would soon become the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to make a report of the supplies wanting, to provide for which, he thought it proper to know the sentiments of the House, on what changes may be necessary from the existing establishment. For his part, he was well convinced that a considerable saving might be made by lopping off all unnecessary expenses in the army establishment. It would be entirely unnecessary to go into the argument at this time, therefore he would merely lay on the table a resolution which he should call up some time next week, after the private report of the Secretary of the Treasury was before the House. The resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, That so much of the act passed the 16th July, 1798, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," as authorizes the President of the United States to raise twelve additional regiments of infantry, and six troops of light dragoons, and to appoint two Major Generals, an Inspector General, three Brigadier Generals, and an Adjutant General; and so much of the act passed the 3d of March, 1799, entitled "An act for the better organization of the troops of the United States, and for other purposes," as authorizes the appointment of a Commander of the Army, and a Quartermaster General, ought to be repealed.

Mr. OTIS said he rose upon this resolution in compliance with a duty he owed the Committee of Defence, of which himself and the gentleman who laid the resolution on the table were members, to state that application was made to the Secretary of the War Department for information on the state of the Military Establishment; until that report was obtained, he thought this resolution improper, for in conformity to that report the Committee would, no doubt, propose some resolutions to the House. He wished the resolution had not been read, because it might cause some alarm, and probably affect our interests at home as well as abroad. Notwithstanding it might be a general belief that some retrenchment of expenses would be necessary, and though it was probable that some modification of the existing Military Establishment might be adopted with a view to save expense, yet he did not believe that in the actual state of things this House would discover such a versatility of temper and system as to disband the Army by a single resolution.

Mr. NICHOLAS replied that he would not be in haste to call up the resolution; and was willing to let it lie, till every information could be obtained that might be wished upon the subject.

The resolution was laid on the table.

JURISDICTION OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MACON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, residing on the Tombigby and Mobile rivers, praying for a confirmation of their title to certain lands, and for the free navigation of said rivers; which Mr. M. moved to have referred to a select committee.

Mr. JONES objected to the House legislating on this subject, on the ground that it involved a right of the State of Georgia to the jurisdiction of that Territory; and that as commissioners had been appointed by act of Congress to settle all existing difficulties as to the jurisdiction of that State, it would be improper for the House to hold forth any encouragement to the petitioners—an encouragement which would only prove delusive, because this House had not the power to grant the relief prayed for. He therefore hoped the petition would be ordered to lie on the table till the claim of the State of Georgia to that Territory should be settled.

JANUARY, 1800.

Petition of Free Blacks.

H. OF R.

Mr. TALIAFERRO and Mr. NICHOLAS advocated the opinion of Mr. JONES.

Mr. GALLATIN thought this was bringing a great and important question before the House in a very indirect way. Before we decided upon this claim, a committee ought to be appointed to inquire what progress had been made by the commissioners appointed to settle the claims of Georgia; and if the question came before the House in any shape, it ought to be in the only proper one, "to whom does this Territory belong?" Mr. G. was decidedly against the reference of the petition to a select committee.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said the petition contained other subjects than the right objected to by Georgia. The navigation of the Tombigby and Mobile rivers, of which they were deprived, was essentially necessary to the commerce of that part of the world, and their claim to this was certainly worthy of attention. The committee, in their report, might be silent as to any subject which would involve the objection urged against the reference.

Messrs. MACON, SEWALL, and RUTLEDGE, were also in favor of the commitment. After a long debate, Mr. MACON waived his motion, so as to have the petition referred to the committee to whom was committed a similar petition on the 24th ult.—which was agreed to.

THURSDAY, January 2.

RICHARD DOBBS SPAIGHT, from North Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

PETITION OF FREE BLACKS.

Mr. WALN presented a petition of Absalom Jones and others, free men of color, of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for a revision of the laws of the United States relative to the slave trade; of the act relative to fugitives from justice; and for the adoption of such measures as shall in due course emancipate the whole of their brethren from their present situation; which he moved to have referred to the committee appointed to inquire whether any and what alterations ought to be made in the existing law prohibiting the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country.

The petitioners, after mentioning their sense of the bounties of Providence in their freedom, and the happiness they felt under such a form of Government, represent that they cannot but be impressed with the hardships under which numbers of their color labored, who they conceived equal objects of representation and attention with themselves or others under the Constitution. That the solemn compact, the Constitution, was violated by the trade of kidnapping, carried on by the people of some of the Southern States on the shores of Maryland and Delaware, by which numbers were hurried into holes and cellars, torn from their families and transported to Georgia, and there inhumanly exposed to sale, which was degrading to the dignified nature of man. That by these and other measures injurious to the human species, there were 700,000 blacks now in slavery in these States. They stated their application to Congress to be, not for the immediate emancipation of the whole, knowing that their degraded state and want of education would render that measure improper, but they ask an amelioration of their hard situation. They prayed that the act called the fugitive bill, which was very severe on that race of people, might be considered; also that the African slave trade might be put a stop to.

Mr. WALN moved its reference to the committee appointed to prohibit carrying on the slave trade to any foreign place or country.

Mr. RUTLEDGE thought any reference at all very improper; he hoped it would be laid on the table, and with a view never to be called up hereafter. Petitions of this sort had repeatedly come before the House, only with the difference of transfer of hands. When the Congress sat at New York, they spent much time and attention on the subject, but no sooner had it been decided that nothing could be done, than the same scenes were acted over again by repeatedly petitioning. Those gentlemen who used to come forward, to be sure, had not avowedly come forward again, but had now put it into the hands of the black gentlemen. They now tell the House these people are in slavery—I thank God they are! if they were not, dreadful would be the consequences. They say they are not represented. To be sure a great number of them are not. Farther, they say they are sent to the Southern States. Who can prevent that? Persons possessing slaves have a right to send them there if they choose. They tell you that they are brought from Africa. This matter is in a train to be prevented, the subject being now in the hands of a committee. Already had too much of this new-fangled French philosophy of liberty and equality found its way and was too apparent among these gentlemen in the Southern States, by which nothing would do but their liberty. This appeared to be the intention of the petition, but he supposed the people of the Eastern States had felt as much in having them among them as those of the Southern States in losing them, and therefore he believed gentlemen from those parts would vote with them. However, he considered this subject very improper and unconstitutional to discuss, and, from the ill effects it might produce, should say no more.

Mr. WALN thought the gentleman mistaken as to the nature of the petition; it related but two grievances: one was, the operation of the fugitive act, by which free men were carried and sold into slavery, and the other was the slave trade. He did not wish to enter into general principles, because he conceived it as improper as any gentleman, but he could see no good reason why the petition might not be committed; every petition presented to the House ought to receive that attention, and a rejection of the present without examination could have no good effect.

Mr. SMILIE was much surprised at the opposition of the gentleman from South Carolina to the reference. To be sure a great part of what these people asked, as far as he was acquainted with it, was out of their power to grant, but there was much of the petition which was within the power of the House. So far as they had power, he considered it the duty of the House to attend and grant relief. He could wish to drop some ideas on the situation of those people, but felt a contrary impulse from motives of prudence. However, he must consider them as a part of the human species, equally capable of suffering and enjoying with others, and equally objects of attention, and therefore they had a claim to be heard.

H. OF R.

Petition of Free Blacks.

Mr. ORIS hoped the petition would not be committed; he had never seen a petition presented under a more dangerous and unpleasant aspect. It appeared to be subscribed by a number of individuals who were incapable of writing their names, or of reading the petition, and, a fortiori, of digesting the principles of it. It therefore was a petition of certain men made out by other men, who ought to have come forward themselves, but had forbore. To encourage a measure of the kind would have an irritating tendency, and must be mischievous to America very soon. It would teach them the art of assembling together, debating, and the like, and would soon, if encouraged, extend from one end of the Union to the other. A great part of the petition was improper, and the other part entirely unnecessary. No particular object or evils were pointed out in the fugitive law, but the truth was, they wanted a repeal of the law. Although, he thanked God he had no slaves, nor ever wished to possess any, yet he thought the subject ought not to be meddled with by the General Government, and if any grievances existed they were properly and only objects of legislation in these several States. It was the duty, and he thought the interest of the States, while they were kept in servitude, to ameliorate their situation as much as consisted with security. He thought those who did not possess that species of property had better leave the regulation of it to those who were cursed with it. However, it was unjust to intermeddle with it to the injury of the possessors.

Mr. H. LEE observed that gentlemen were sent to that House to protect the rights of the people and the rights of property. That property which the people of the Southern States possess consisted of slaves, and therefore Congress had no authority but to protect it, and not take measures to deprive the citizens of it. He said he held himself not second to any gentleman in a genuine attachment to the rights of humanity, but he could not believe that great ends would be answered by the reference of the petition, but much evil might accrue. It contained sentiments which he thought it would be highly improper so far to encourage. One object prayed for in this petition was now in the hands of a committee; let that committee report respecting the Guinea trade, let it be entirely obliterated; to that he would agree with all his heart, but he hoped the House would never intermeddle with the property of any of the citizens. Instead of voting with the worthy member who wished it to lie on the table, he would have it returned to the gentleman who presented it, as the only effectual means of checking an injurious practice.

Mr. RUTLEDGE, in addition to his former arguments, observed, that so improper was it to consider this subject that some of the States would never have adopted the federal form of Government if it had not been secured to them that Congress would never legislate on the subject of slavery. Inasmuch, therefore, as it might rouse the jealousy and fears of those States, the least attention paid to it might do mischief.

Mr. THATCHER said that gentlemen generally set out wrong, on this subject, and leave off about half right; they debated till they were almost tired, and then the petition was not to be committed. If Congress had not power to legislate on the African trade, then why did they say it was with a committee? If they had power, where was the impropriety of referring, at least that part which could be considered? Would any gentleman say that it was policy not to legislate about 700,000 enemies, in the very body of the United States? While they were slaves they were enemies. He declared a greater evil than the very principle could not exist; it was a cancer of immense magnitude, that would some time destroy the body politic, except a proper legislation should prevent the evil. It must come before the House sooner or later. Then why postpone it? It was true the Eastern States were now suffering from the streams which issued from this great and dangerous fountain, but the evil ought to be stopped, ere it become too strong.

Upon principles less general, he contended the petition, which was couched in as decent and respectful terms as was possible, should be referred. Whether the petitioners were black or white, whether they could write, or whether not, was entirely immaterial: they stated their sufferings under a law of the United States, and that was argument enough for a respectable reference. Because they could not write, were not their rights to be secured to them? Strange doctrine! A great reason why they could not write was their being brought up in early life in slavery.

If gentlemen saw so great evil rise out of the debate on this subject, why did they introduce the evil practice? They might have silently suffered it to have been committed; no evil could have arisen therefrom, because the committee would have reported only consistently with the power of the House to grant.

Mr. BROWN, of Rhode Island, said he was in hopes that every member belonging to the Northern States would have seen by this time the impropriety of encouraging slaves to come from the Southern States to reside as vagabonds and thieves among them, and have been tired of the bad policy. No subject surely was so likely to cause a division of the States as that respecting slaves. He did not hold a slave in the world, he said, but he was as much for supporting the rights and property of those who did, as though he was a slave owner. He considered this as much personal property as a farm or a ship, which was incontestably so. He went into a view of the federal compact, to argue the impropriety of legislating on the subject. This petition, he said, did not come from the blacks, but from a combination of people who had troubled Congress for many years past, and he feared never would cease. He did not fear the power of the 700,000 enemies that the gentleman had pointed out, since there were five millions to withstand them: they could at any time subdue them. He begged that the gentleman, who put the petition on the table, might be desired to take it back again. He was sorry to see the commitment supported by two such worthy members of the House, both good Federalists. [A laugh.]

We want money, said Mr. B., we want a navy; we ought therefore to use the means to obtain it. We ought to go farther than has yet been proposed, and repeal the bills in question altogether, for why should we see Great Britain getting all the slave trade to themselves; why may not our country be enriched by that lucrative traffic? There would not be a slave the more sold, but we should derive the benefits by importing from Africa as well as that nation.

Mr. WALN contended, that at least the House had the power of legislating on the state of free blacks as well as other people, and on the slave trade, much of which was still carrying on from Rhode Island, Boston and Pennsylvania. This ought to be looked into. He denied that any idea had ever entered his mind on presenting the petition either to debate on the subject, or to will an emancipation of the slaves. Gentlemen from the Southern States appeared to lament there were so many among them, but their conduct was very contrary to their declaration.

Mr. HILL thought if any evil existed under any law now in force, a committee ought to be appointed, to examine into and correct it; but he hoped the petition would not be committed. It was to be lamented that this kind of property did exist; but it did exist, and was sanctioned by the Constitution. That being the case, the House ought to set their faces against any innovations on it, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. DENNIS rose, he said, principally because he conceived the petition implicated the justice of the States of Maryland and Delaware, respecting the abominable practice of kidnapping. In justice to the State he represented, he must say that none of this evil was attributable to that State, because they had enacted extremely penal laws to stop it. He wished the petition to lie on the table, because the objects of it appeared to be extremely multifarious, and, he believed but few members knew its contents, from the different opinions they had advanced. He wished them to have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped that the conduct of the House would be so decided as to deter the petitioners, or any persons acting for them, from ever presenting one of a similar nature hereafter. The effects must be extremely injurious. He did wish that the conduct of the House would have been so indignant as to have passed it over without discussion. He should not, therefore, say anything that would tend to encourage that discussion. The Constitution had put it out of the power of the House to do anything in it, and therefore he hoped the motion for a reference would be lost by a decided majority, and this be the last time the business of the House would be entered upon, and the interest and feelings of the Southern States be put in jeopardy, by similar applications.

Mr. CHRISTIE said the gentleman was mistaken, if he thought it would be the last time, for a certain society had thought it their duty to present petitions of this nature to Congress every year since he was acquainted with it; but he hoped this, which came from that source, but through other hands, would have the fate of all the rest, and go under the table instead of upon it. As to the fugitive law, he would wish it to be taken up, and if no other member moved it, he should; but not for the purpose of repeal or weakening, but to make it stronger. There was now a fine laid upon any person who should harbor a black, knowing him, or her to be a slave; he wished the provision should be that the persons harboring should know that he or her was not a slave. He mentioned the great desire of his State to prevent kidnapping, for which their laws were very severe.

Mr. HARPER had hoped that the House so well understood this subject, as to the people who instigated the petitioners to come forward, who well knew that nothing could be done by Congress, as to decide on it instantly. This was the act of a religious body of people whose fanaticism leads them to think it a bounden duty to come to the House every year, though they now come in a different name. By this measure they had discharged their duty; all that now remained was for the House to discharge theirs. He hoped, from the present time, they should merely let the petition be read and pass it over in silence—for he expected that society would continue presenting petitions. The obvious tendency of agitating this question would only be to create discontent in a class of people whom it was out of the power of the Legislature to change the situation of. He called upon gentlemen to say whether a temper of revolt was not more perceptible in that quarter? It was; and what was the cause of it but that they were not let alone by those people; but if others would disturb them, he hoped at least that House would cease to do it.

Mr. DANA said if the petition before the House contained nothing but a farrago of the French metaphysics of liberty and equality, he should think that it was likely to produce some of the dreadful scenes of St. Domingo. Or if he believed it was only the effects of a religious fanaticism in a set of men who thought they were doing their duty, though he thought the subject quite out of the power of Congress, he might be disposed to think it quite wrong. But when he perceived a petition, addressed in language which was very decent, and which expressly declared that the petitioners did not wish the House to do what was inconsistent with the Constitution, but only asked an amelioration of the severities under which people of their color labored, he thought it ought to be received and committed. He did not think the gentleman who presented it ought to withdraw it, nor was he the least culpable, but executed a duty he conceived him bound to.

Mr. JONES said the petition threw so much aspersions upon the State he represented (Georgia) that he must think it his duty to rise. Why was that State to be selected out from all others? However, he should follow the petition in its parts, in order to show that the petitioners actually had asked what it was not in the power of the House to legislate upon—emancipation. It was said to merely affect the slave trade.

First, the petitioners contemplated that those people (the slaves) ought to be represented, "with us and the rest of the citizens of the United States." Then they speak of the Federal compact, in which they consider those people as interested in common with others, under these words: "we, the people of the United States of America," &c. I would ask gentlemen whether, with all their philanthropy, they would wish to see those people sitting by their sides deliberating in the councils of the nation? He presumed not. They go on farther and say, "We do not ask for the immediate emancipation of all, but we ask you to prepare the way for the oppressed to go free, that every yoke might be broken, thus keeping up the principle to do unto others as you would they should do unto you." The words need only be read to convince every man what is the tendency of their request. The gentleman farther says, that 700,000 men are in bondage. I ask him how he would remedy this evil as he calls it? but I do not think it is any evil; would he have these people turned out in the United States to ravage, murder, and commit every species of crime? I believe it might have been happy for the United States if these people had never been introduced amongst us, but I do believe that they have been immensely benefited by coming amongst us. It was the British Government that transmitted them down to us when in a colonized state, but being here, and being the property of individuals, after obtaining our common liberty and forming our Federal compact, property and safety were guaranteed to every individual and State in the Confederation. How then can this House meddle with that part of our property? The General Government has no power over it.

With respect to that part of the petition which said that these people were crowded into cellars and transported to Georgia, Mr. J. informed the House that the importation to that State by sea had been prohibited; none had come there by sea for many years, and offenders against that law were fined £100 sterling for each individual thus introduced. He hoped the petition would be treated with the contempt it merited, and thrown under the table.

Mr. RUTLEDGE rose to move that the question might be decided by yeas and nays. It was a practice he generally was against, and scarcely ever moved, but he considered this of importance sufficient to demand it. It was a question in which the interests of a great number of people in this country were involved. He had no doubt it would be lost by a very great majority, and he thought it would have a good effect to be recorded by how vast a majority it would be lost. He thought it would be some consolation to his constituents, when he returned home, to say how few of the House of Representatives were the supporters of this dangerous petition.

Mr. WALN said if he had known that this petition would have caused so much alarm, he certainly should have desired the petitioners not to present it; but if they had still thought it necessary and been desirous of it, he should, as he then thought it within the power of Legislation, and still thought so, have presented it. He thought it his duty; whenever any individual conceived himself injured by a law, to receive his petition, and he thought himself in no wise implicated in the manner, form, or subject of the petition, or answerable for it as containing his opinions. If it should be supposed that the assertions in the petition were unfounded, or bore too hard on a certain State, the only way to ascertain that fact was by referring to a committee, that the necessary inquiries might be reported. He again declared his disapprobation at this subject undergoing any discussion, nor would it have taken place had not the gentleman from South Carolina commenced it.

Mr. PLATT conceived that everything which was brought before that House ought to be committed, unless there was manifest indecency in the language, or it should appear that the relief prayed for could not be granted consistently with the power of the House. In his opinion, except one of these two causes prevented, it unquestionably ought to be thus disposed of. As for indecency of expression, he could perceive none, either in the petition, or in the arguments of the gentlemen who advocated its reference. A third reason indeed might be mentioned, which was, that the persons whose names were signed did not give consent to the petition, and therefore it was not their act. Neither of these reasons was proved to have existed.

Although, agreeably to the Constitution, Congress could not make any laws to prevent the emigration or importation of any persons whom the several States should, at the adoption thereof, think proper to admit, yet Congress could, and had made laws relative to fugitives from justice and previous to the year 1800. It was this law they prayed the amelioration of, and that the power of persons over their slaves might be limited, and that the law might be so amended as to prevent its violation. It was for that, and not for the general abolition of slavery they prayed, and surely they ought to be heard; their prayer ought to be committed for that purpose.

He disclaimed the least desire, but an abhorrence, of any principle that would rob persons of their property, but at the same time he was not such a dupe to words as to be of the opinion held up by a gentleman that because the French had used the words "reason" and "philosophy" he should discard them, and with them humanity!

Mr. THATCHER thought that to make use of the incapacity of these people to read or write, as an argument against committing their petition, must arise out of prejudice in his colleague against the general object, or he surely never would have resorted to such pitiful, and he might say, mean, virulent remarks. [Mr. T. was here called to order.] This was certainly a "new-fangled doctrine." But the reason why they could not write was because of the degraded state of their minds for want of education; many of them, perhaps, in their youth were in slavery.

Petition of Free Blacks.

The gentleman from Georgia had objected to the reference because the petition contained a system of facts which he said was not true? He (Mr. T.) believed they were true, and thus the dispute was in issue. How was this to be ascertained but by inquiry? If the State of Georgia should prove themselves innocent of that black stain, it would be to their honor. But no, said the gentlemen, "We will not have it examined into, because it will make us out to be as black as the petitioners themselves!"

Mr. EDMOND observed that the gentleman from South Carolina had called for the yeas and nays for a particular purpose, to wit, that it should be seen how few voted for this intermeddling with the property of the people in the Southern States. Mr. E. said he should vote for the reference, and as that opinion would be attached to his conduct, his reasons ought to accompany his vote. He should be as far from wishing to affect the property of the citizens as any gentleman, much less should he wish to affect the Constitution. This appeared to him to be a very respectful petition; it mattered not whether the people were black or white; the petition only was to be regarded, and not the color of the persons, who, representing their grievances, asked for such relief as the Constitution could afford them. Surely then, every measure ought to be adopted to alleviate their sufferings. Was it consistent that the House, instead of a reasonable and patient attention, should come forward and treat this complaint with an inattention which passion only could dictate? Was contempt the way to recommend attachment to the Government? This ferment and scorn could not be necessary, but he was sure it was highly improper and inconsistent.

Mr. GALLATIN said that in his opinion there were many parts of the petition exceptionable, but not being so much acquainted with it as might be necessary to form a decision, he could not say whether or not it was in the power of the House to legislate on it. However, seeing this much in the situation with other petitions, he felt disposed, and should vote for its reference. If it should appear improper for Congress to legislate on it, then the committee would so report. He said he was not satisfied that there was no grievance to which the House could apply a remedy; he thought there was such a part. He remembered a petition from Delaware once on one of the complaints, that of kidnapping free negroes; therefore, he conceived it was truth, and could be no insult to the States of Delaware and Maryland to mention it. If so, surely an effectual remedy ought to be applied. In the former State he believed they had made the punishment death, and yet the evil was not prevented, if the complaints of the petitioners were true.

Mr. WALN then withdrew his former motion, and moved "that so much of the petition as related to the slave trade carried on from any part of the United States to any foreign place or country; and so much of the said petition as respected fugitives from justice, or escaped from their masters, be referred to the committee appointed on the 12th day of December last on the subject of the slave trade."

Mr. RUTLEDGE appealed to the Chair to know whether the motion was in order.

Mr. SPEAKER said, perhaps that was the only deliberative body in the world where a motion, having been made, seconded, and debated, could be withdrawn by either the mover or seconder. But it had been a practice in that House so to do, and there was no rule against it. The motion was therefore perfectly agreeable to order.

Mr. RUTLEDGE then moved, an adjournment, which was carried—yeas 47, nays 35.

FRIDAY, January 3.

BENJAMIN HUGER, from South Carolina, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

PETITION OF FREE BLACKS.

The House resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, on the resolution for referring certain parts of the petition of Absalom Jones and others, when,

Mr. RUTLEDGE rose to explain his reasons for moving the adjournment yesterday, as not having arisen from a desire of protracting the debate, but because he conceived the Chair misunderstood him on the point of order. When he submitted the question of order to the Chair, it appeared from the decision to be the Speaker's opinion that the question was, whether a member had a right to withdraw a motion in that situation or not. He knew that right to exist, but he doubted of the competency of the House to refer parts of a petition, and not the whole. In his opinion it ought not to be referred, or, if so, the whole ought to be referred generally. He mentioned a petition which was last session presented from Northampton county, praying the repeal of the alien and sedition laws, but in their general zeal in the pursuance of those objects severally, other laws were found fault with, particularly those relating to measures of defence. These were thought to be improper for a reference; on which a motion was made to refer a part, but it was then thought the petition could not be divided. He submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania a very easy mode of acquiring the object, which was by withdrawing the petition and advising the petitioners to present one conformable to the decision, and within the Constitutional power of the House. Gentlemen were mistaken in saying that petitions of this kind came annually. The session before last the subject was referred to a committee, who made a suitable report upon it, and in order to prevent the continual debate it was resolved to be a proper object of Judicial, and not of Legislative cognizance. This brought the matter to such an understanding that he hoped he would have heard no more of it. It appeared to have had the good effect of preventing any application during the sitting of last session.

The SPEAKER said the question of order, as now explained by the member from South Carolina, was not understood by the Chair. From all the examination and the fruits of inquiry which the Chair had since acquired, it appeared not to be unusual to refer parts of a subject, for parts of the President's Speech had been referred; also, parts of petitions had frequently been referred; on which account the opinion of the Chair at present, unless an appeal should be made to the House, was, that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was perfectly in order.

Mr. WALN said it would have been very agreeable to him that the question should have been taken on the motion first made to the House; but, on hearing the warmth with which it was contested, and willing to remove the jealousy of several gentlemen in the House, he thought it best to alter the motion to their wishes.

It had been suggested that to withdraw the petition for its modification, would be an easy way to acquire the object. He thought it entirely unnecessary to withdraw it in this stage of business. Although he could have wished the words objected to had never been inserted, yet he was not prepared to say that the petitioners had no right to use them. It appeared that these people's sentiments accorded with those of the gentlemen who opposed the reference. They wished to obtain a removal of this great evil when proper: those gentlemen called it an evil which they could wish to get rid of, but they think it cannot be done. Mr. W. said he should not have objected to a resolution importing that it would be improper to legislate on the subject of slavery, but so far as relates to the bad traffic, and the practice of kidnapping, they ought to be examined by a committee. On these accounts he was not authorized, nor was he inclined to withdraw the petition.

He was in hopes the gentleman from South Carolina would not have desisted from his motion for calling the yeas and nays; that gentleman wished the House to show the world that this petition was so irritating and alarming as to merit universal contempt and abhorrence. He believed this gentleman was mistaken as to the small number he supposed would vote for its commitment, and therefore wished he would renew the motion on the question as modified.

Mr. GOODE then observed that as a public discussion had taken place upon this subject—one from which he thought Congress precluded by the Constitution, and one which materially affected the interest and perhaps the safety of a great portion of the United States, and particularly of his constituents, he thought it his duty not only to give his negative in the usual manner, but to call for the pointed disapprobation of the House, and proposed to amend the resolution by adding the following words:

"And that the parts of the said petition which invite Congress to legislate upon subjects from which the General Government is precluded by the Constitution, have a tendency to create disquiet and jealousy, and ought therefore to receive the pointed disapprobation of this House."

Mr. THATCHER said it was the first time that he had ever known any petition or part of a petition receive the "pointed disapprobation of the House" by a resolution, even though the object of it was not within the power of the House. Several petitions had been received upon which the House had no power. He referred to the petition of John Churchman, in December 1791, praying the patronage of Government to facilitate his discovery of the longitude, by enabling him to undertake a voyage to Baffin's Bay. It was reported that great inconvenience operated to prevent the grant prayed for, and no money was allowed, yet no member moved a censure upon the petitioner. Was it a desirable object to do away a great evil? It was professed to be the wish of several gentlemen to eradicate it. No gentleman in the House but appeared desirous of embracing it with all his heart. These people only wished the evil destroyed, but did not point out the form. He was willing, for the sake of argument, to admit that slavery did exist and was sanctioned by the laws and Constitution of the United States; he did not believe the fact, but as some other gentlemen did, he would admit it for the present. Surely it would be desirable that this great evil should be destroyed, if it could be done without injury, nay, with advantage, to the possessors. Did the petition go any farther than this? It did not. The second person in the Government of the United States had devised a means to procure this object, as also had a certain learned professor. If it was therefore the desire, as avowed, of those gentlemen, and an equitable means had been devised to acquire it, would the reference of a petition which made that request be improper, or would it be impolitic in gentlemen to examine these plans, and if eligible bring about their execution? Certainly not. Even if a certain sum of money was wanting he did not believe the House would refuse to appropriate it. Who would not withhold a few dollars from his purse to facilitate it? Then, while such are the propositions, a petition in behalf of its accomplishment ought to be heard; if it is not, it must fix a national indignity and stigma which ages of good actions could never wipe away.

Gentlemen supposed the friends of the reference were got to such a high degree of enthusiasm as to destroy the very essence of philanthropy. He professed himself to be no friend to some of the doctrines of the French, but there were others he much admired. It was an admirable attempt in them, and well executed, to liberate their slaves. So far we ought not to be behindhand with their philanthropic conduct. If slavery is an evil the French have wiped away this evil. He submitted to gentlemen whether it could not be fully procured with very little injury to the owners; he begged them to review the several plans which had been proposed, and act upon them if attainable.

JANUARY, 1800.

Petition of Free Blacks.

H. OF R.

Mr. T. said he should be much grieved if any gentleman in the House should advocate the motion of pointed disapprobation towards men who respectfully complained and petitioned the House. He should think it a plain contradiction to tell them that they had professed it their wish to destroy slavery; it would be a plain demonstration that they hugged slavery as slavery, and loved it for its very odiousness.

He was sorry to hear such harsh reflections insinuated against a very respectable body of men who were declared to be, if not the ostensible, yet the actual authors of these "discontents." From all his acquaintance with that body he had never perceived any conduct in them to promote anarchy or disturbance; on the contrary, he had often observed that wherever there was a humane or benevolent institution, the Quakers were at the bottom of it. He thought, therefore, that they little deserved the odium which had been lavished on them.

Mr. DANA was not of the opinion of a number of gentlemen, that the House ought to express its indignation against these petitions. The indignation of that House ought to be limited to certain objects; it might be expressed against an offending nation, but he much doubted whether it became it to express that high sensation against any individuals. He thought no circumstance could occur which called for such condescension, and therefore he could not approve of words so strongly expressed upon an occasion comparatively so trivial. If the gentleman from Virginia would so convey his ideas as to express the impropriety of those subjects for the consideration of this House, he was willing to agree with him.

Mr. RUTLEDGE thought it a little extraordinary that when gentlemen from some parts of the Union were positively assured that very serious, nay, dreadful effects, must be the inevitable consequence of their discussions on this subject, they still would persist. He used strong words, he said, because no others would be appropriate. Gentlemen recommended the subject to be calmly argued.—Would gentlemen feel calm if measures were taken to destroy most of their property? Would calmness be consistent if entering wedges were prepared to ruin the property of whole estates? If ever it was justifiable to be warm on any subject in the House, it surely was on an occasion like the present, when imminent danger was in view. Yes, we deem this as an entering wedge to an inevitable loss of our property, if persisted in. It appeared by the gentleman's arguments that he had just been reading the opinions of his brother philosopher, Brissot.

Three emissaries from St. Domingo appeared in the hall of the Convention, demanding the emancipation of their species from slavery. The Convention were told it would operate as an entering wedge that would go to the destruction of property, and the loss of one of the finest islands in the world; that it would be murderous in the extreme; that it would open scenes which had never been practised since the destruction of Carthage; that a whole rich country would be buried in blood; that thousands would instantly be reduced to abject penury; that the first towns in that fine island would be reduced to a heap of ashes. But those gentlemen said no, it cannot be, all our desires originate in philanthropy—we wish to do good! But sir, we have lived to see these dreadful scenes. These horrid effects have succeeded what was conceived once to be trifling. Most important consequences may be the result, although gentlemen little apprehend it. But we know the situation of things there, although they do not, and knowing we deprecate it. There have been emissaries amongst us in the Southern States; they have begun their war upon us; an actual organization has commenced; we have had them meeting in their club rooms, and debating on that subject, and determinations have been made. It might be wrong in me to mention these things, because many of those people can read and write, and will be informed of what I am now saying, which they think I did not know, but knowing, I am determined to make use of.

Sir, I do believe that persons have been sent from France to feel the pulse of this country, to know whether these are the proper engines to make use of: these people have been talked to; they have been tampered with, and this is going on. They now will see that the argument has been agitated in the Legislature; that the subject of emancipation has been discussed. Is not this extremely wrong, when gentlemen are told how much it puts our property at hazard. Although these people are unable to do any harm, yet the work will be done by gentlemen in this House, they must be answerable for the mischief.

Before I had the honor of a seat in this House, one question which was agitated by the people was, how do the General Legislature regard this species of property? I said, our brethren in the Northern States are willing to leave this business entirely to us who possess it—they will not intermeddle. I did hope that they never would take the lead in any arguments of this dangerous tendency. But, as gentlemen have gone into this business, I find I am compelled to use arguments which otherwise ought not to be mentioned.

I recollect that gentlemen in France used arguments like the gentleman from Massachusetts: "We can indemnify these proprietors." But how did they do it, or how can it be done?—Not at all. Farther, we were told these things would take place, we need not be alarmed; it was inevitable; that it was reasonable, and unavoidable. Sir, it never will take place. There is one alternative which will save us from it, but that alternative I deprecate very much; that is, that we are able to take care of ourselves, and if driven to it, we will take care of ourselves.

The gentleman talked much about longitude; it appears to me when he brought up that petition as a precedent he was very much out of his latitude. [A laugh.] That circumstance related to a grant of money which it was thought prudent not to make. Did that go to a national right? He thought the gentleman was rather too witty on a subject so solemn as this must appear to the world.

Petition of Free Blacks.

JANUARY, 1800.

Mr JONES had hoped that the decision of Congress when sitting at New York would have put a final stop to any future applications, and the councils of the United States would have been troubled no farther with them. It was justly and wisely proved that it was a difficulty unfit for Congress to attempt, on account of the extremely different local circumstances and species of property possessed by the Northern and Southern members, who were all met in one convention. However, he must do justice to the candor of some gentlemen from the North, who had vindicated their right to this property. Mr. J. did not think there was any more probability of discovering an eligible and just mode of acquiring the object of emancipation, than there was in the case referred by the gentleman to Mr. Churchman's discovery of longitude. All researches into these attempts were illusory, and both alike impracticable at this time, if ever they would be. However, he was certain that the honorable gentleman's manner of treating the subject would give rise to a just jealousy in those parts of the United States whose property consisted only in slaves. As to the State he represented, as he before said, a very heavy penalty was the fine on each slave imported, and killing, maiming, or ill treating them was punished severely by the whites. He could not think but the arguments of some gentleman must originate from improper motives.

He should vote for the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Goode.) It was time to say what the House could or could not legislate upon; what it could not, ought to be marked with disapprobation. He should vote for the amendment, but when the question was taken on the general subject of reference he should vote against it. This he thought the most effectual way to show a just disapprobation.

Mr. GOODE then amended his motion, so as to read instead of "ought to receive the pointed disapprobation of this House," "ought to receive the disapprobation of this House."

Mr. EDMOND could not conceive any danger from committing this petition, whatever alarms some gentlemen had apprehended. But as gentlemen apprehended so much danger from committing certain parts of the petition, he would be willing to quiet these alarms, and do everything reasonable by expressing an idea that Congress would not legislate upon what belonged not to them. The amendment at first proposed, he professed himself much opposed to, upon the ground that the House were about to express a pointed disapprobation towards the petitioners, which he conceived wrong, because no censure could be due where a petition was respectfully addressed. But as now modified he had no objection to adopt the amendment; not that he conceived it important, but because it tended to quiet the minds of some gentlemen in the House.

Mr. WALN again said, that it was not his intention to advocate the emancipation of slaves, but only to ameliorate their state. He therefore would cheerfully consent to the amendment as amended.

Consent being given by the mover to incorporate the amendment with the original resolution, it was now all before the House in the form of one resolution.

Mr. THATCHER said, as an abstract proposition, he should have no objection; he thought the House ought to give no countenance to anything that it could not legislate on by the Constitution; but as he did not believe the petition contained any such proposition, he must adhere to his former sentiments, and could not consent to the incorporation of the words. As amended, he disliked it much less than before, but he did not like it as connected with the first motion.

Mr. J. BROWN asked whether it was in order for a gentleman to speak five or six times.

Mr. THATCHER said he had spoken but once on this question. The gentleman from Rhode Island need not be afraid, for he was not now going to say much about slavery, which was the nearest to his heart. Mr. T. was fully of the opinion that the House had a right to take up the subject, and give it a full, free, and deliberate discussion, but this did not appear to be the general opinion. As he was opposed to the motion, as amended, he was willing his name should appear against it, even though no other gentleman should think fit to vote with him.

Mr. GALLATIN conceived that there certainly were parts of the petition over which that House had no power, for though the petitioners did not pray for emancipation to be completed immediately, yet they anticipated that it would some time be done, and their prayer included a wish that the House would take a preparatory step. As to the amendment, although he did not like the wording of it altogether, he had no objection to the principle, and therefore should vote for it; for he thought it right to say that it was improper for the House to legislate on the subject. What was not specifically acknowledged by the Constitution, in his opinion, carried with it a doubt upon which the Legislature ought not to enter.

Mr. THATCHER called for a division of the question.

Mr. NICHOLAS, on this, expressed some embarrassment as to giving his vote, on which he moved to strike out the latter part. The same appeared to pervade the minds of several gentlemen.

Mr. WALN, therefore, to relieve the House from the situation, withdrew his acquiescence to the amendment, so as to leave the questions distinct. The yeas and nays had been several times moved during the embarrassed state of the House, but were only taken once, to wit, on the amendment to the former proposition:

"And that the parts of the said petition which invite Congress to legislate upon subjects from which the General Government is precluded by the Constitution, have a tendency to create disquiet and jealousy, and ought therefore to receive no encouragement or countenance from this House."

The question was taken, that the House do agree to the same, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 1, as follows:

And then the main question, to agree to the said motion, as amended, being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. HARRISON, from the select committee, reported a bill to reform the Superior Courts of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, which was twice read and committed.

MONDAY, January 6.

Mr. D. FOSTER reported a bill from the Committee of Claims, for the relief of John Vaughan, which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the whole House for to-morrow.

PEACE WITH THE INDIAN TRIBES.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for preserving peace with the Indian tribes, which was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for the third reading to-morrow.

The continuance of the bill is limited to the 2d of March 1802, which was stated by Mr. CLAIBORNE to be in consequence of the expiring of some other bill or bills at that period, relating to the same subject, so that one general bill might then be introduced.

COURTS IN OHIO.

The bill to reform the Superior Courts in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio, was called up, when Mr. DAVIS stated some reasons for wishing its postponement for a week, which he moved. This being agreed to, Mr. D. moved as follows:

"That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to establish a Circuit Court in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, and the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio."

Mr. GALLATIN then moved the reference of that resolution to the committee appointed some time since to report a mode of reform for the Judiciary Courts of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS opposed this motion, but it was agreed to.

REMISSION OF PENALTIES.

The resolution reported by the Committee of Revisal, &c., was taken up, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to repeal so much of the act passed March 3d, 1797, "to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," as limits its continuance to the end of the present session of Congress.

Ordered, That the same committee do prepare the same.

DUTY ON SPIRITS, STAMPS, &c.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution.

"That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to bring in a bill to consolidate into one act and amend the several acts, for laying duties on spirits distilled in the United States, and on stills, and for collecting the same."

Mr. H. said the subject was attended to, at the last session, and a bill was prepared, but owing to the shortness of the session was not passed. A consolidation of the several laws on this subject must certainly appear desirable. The amendments proposed at present were of two kinds; one for increasing the number of supervisors, which now was only one for each State; and in order to accommodate the business, superintendents were appointed; thus a circuitous and troublesome communication was held up from the collectors to the superintendents, from them to the supervisors, and from thence to the Treasury. It was proposed to abolish superintendentships, and increase supervisorships. Again, the irregular mode of compensation to the officers employed, was found a grievance. At present, they received a per centage on their receipts. This, in some, amounted to too high a salary, while in others, although the per centage was increased, it was too low. It was thought all officers with the same trust ought to receive about the same salary. Other amendments might probably be suggested when the business came before the House.

Mr. HARPER said he was also instructed to move the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend an act for laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, and to abolish the offices heretofore established for stamping vellum, parchment, and paper, in the several districts of the United States, and to establish at the seat of Government one general office for that purpose.

At the time the act was passed, Mr. H. observed, it was thought most convenient, for expedition, to distribute those offices into different parts of the United States. This most probably had been accomplished, and it was now thought necessary to bring all the business immediately under the superintendence of the Government.

The resolutions were referred to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order for Wednesday.

UNIFORM BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee appointed, reported a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

TUESDAY, January 7.

JAMES SHEAFE, of New Hampshire, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

The bill for the relief of John Vaughan was taken up and ordered to a third reading, which it received next day and passed.

The bill for the preservation of peace with the Indian tribes was read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of War, exhibiting the expenses of the National Armory at Springfield, Massachusetts; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. NICHOLAS called up the resolution which he laid on the table on Wednesday last, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the act passed the 16th July, 1798, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," as authorizes the President of the United States to raise twelve additional regiments of infantry, and six troops of light dragoons, and to appoint two Major Generals, an Inspector General, three Brigadier Generals, and an Adjutant General; and so much of the act passed the 3d March, 1799, entitled "An act for the better organizing of the troops of the United States, and for other purposes," as authorizes the appointment of a Commander of the Army, and a Quartermaster General, ought to be repealed.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he was led to make this proposition from a strong sense of his duty; that while speaking on the subject, he hoped to treat it in such a manner as to give no occasion for a revival of those passions which had been too predominant in times past, and that if his arguments met their assent, they would find no resistance from resentment. Sir, he continued, I am led to this measure from a sense of its necessity, in our present situation. I think the affairs of this country require a strict economy in their administration, perhaps at this period more than at any former, and that with this principle, our foreign consequence and domestic happiness is most intimately connected.

Upon the information of the Secretary of the Treasury, we are told there is a new appropriation of 8,162,923 dollars wanted; this, gentlemen will observe, is independent of the permanent appropriations of Government. On examining the subject, as well as I have been able, I find the comparison of the expenditures with the revenue will stand as follows:

New appropriations to be made.

For the civil list	$562,275	95
For grants and annuities	953	33
For the Mint	13,300	00

For foreign intercourse, &c.	$ 92,000	00
For expenses of treaties	244,000	00
For expenses of valuation of lands, dwelling houses &c.	215,000	00

For military pensions	93,000	00
For Navy Department (exclusive of 74's)	2,482,953	99
For fabrication of cannon, arms, &c.	260,000	00
For light-houses, &c.	98,240	03
For miscellaneous claims	34,000	00

8,762,923 30

Appropriations already made.

For foreign intercourse	40,000	00
Annuities to Algiers and Indians	60,000	00
For interest on public debt	3,020,000	00
For do. domestic loans	616,000	00
For do. Dutch debt	511,121	00

4,247,121 00

For reimbursement of Public Debt.

Instalment of Dutch debt	400,000	00
Do. Bank do.	200,000	00
Unexpended appropriation of last year for 74-gun ships	650,000	00

Total 14,260,044 30

Revenue.

Imports, excise, &c., as in 1799	7,350,000
Land tax	1,900,000
	9,250,000 00

Deficiency 5,010,044, 30

Deficiencies in the land tax and unexpended appropriations of last year will equal any saving in military appropriations.

The sum of 5,000,000 dollars is the least which we shall be expected to provide; this we understand is to be done by loan, and there is no expectation of getting it at a lower interest than 8 per cent. As we are to be embarked in a system of this kind, and it may be necessary to pursue it for years, it will be proper to consider how far the present revenues of the United States afford a fund for future credit, or, in other words, what surplus there will be after paying the ordinary expenses of Government as they will be in time of profound peace. On such a surplus, or if none, on additional taxes for payment of interest, the power of borrowing can alone depend. To ascertain whether any such surplus will exist, I will state the expenditures of the next year as they will be if every war expense ceases with the present year:

Ordinary Expenses of 1801.

For interest on domestic debt, including two per cent.	$3,020,000
Ditto on deferred do.	1,116,000

On this balance will be chargeable expenses of navy, fortifications, arms, foundries, treaties, &c., which will no doubt exhaust it. An instalment of the Dutch debt will become due next year, which is not taken into account, because as principal money it might not be properly considered as a necessary expense. On this view it would seem that you have no fund for borrowing in the present revenues of the United States, after the present year; and that if we confirm a system of expense which will require loans hereafter, we must accompany it with taxes, or submit to the disgraceful and ruinous system of borrowing money to pay the interest of our debts.

The army which is comprehended in that resolution, non-commissioned officers and privates, amounts to 9,000 men: the army retained will then be 5,000 men, non-commissioned officers and privates. In the course of the last two years it will be observed that great additions were made to the permanent Army of the United States by a regiment of artillery and a number of men being annexed to each company, by which the number is made to amount to 5,000.

Sir, the finances of this country would be in an alarming state, if all the present expenses were necessary, but my opinion is, that they are not necessary, for that this additional army is in no wise useful. I cannot conceive for what they are wanted. The idea of invasion, the only ground upon which their necessity could be founded, is quite out of the question—an event of that sort in the present state of Europe, is absolutely impossible; whatever possible changes may take place, on considering the difficulties and inducements, it seems to me morally impossible. If there is not so great a certainty as I believe there is, the improbability of the event is so great that we cannot be justified in keeping up so expensive a preparation for it. If that improbable contingency should ever be brought about, we have a competent defence in the patriotism of the people. The self-interest of all the people of the United States, if no other principle should call them out, would be an infallible defence against invasion from an enemy.

But I suppose very little will be said about the usefulness of the present army, but we shall hear more of the effects which a measure of this kind would have on the state of our negotiation in Europe. I suppose, therefore, that the question will turn on the propriety of dismissing this army while our Commissioners are treating, and therefore this view of the subject may merit a few remarks.

The importance of this army in the negotiation seems to me to be entirely dependent on its importance in the kind of warfare we may expect to carry on with France. If it is not important in that, I cannot conceive how it is to influence the negotiation which is to end it. It would be an extraordinary effect that our army should produce a termination of the war when it cannot affect it in its progress. I have before stated my opinion on the danger of invasion, and I would say more, but that the public understanding has, I believe, decided in the same way; and, if not in repelling invasion, I should be glad to learn how the army can resist the views of France, so as to induce her to abandon them.

It is desirable, I should imagine, that at entering on a negotiation our country should be so situated as to be able to make a firm and obstinate stand against unjust demands. If this is a desirable situation, I ask gentlemen to say whether this army does not lessen, instead of increasing our importance, with that country to which we go to negotiate, when it is apparent to the world that for its support we borrow money of more than one half the amount of the revenue, and pay interest on that loan at an enormous rate. This being known, will it not operate as a strong ground for suspicion that you are forced to the negotiation from pecuniary considerations; that your present state of exertion is greater than you can bear for any length of time, and thus lessen your respectability with that nation? While it may hurry you to submit to terms less advantageous than could be wished, it may make the terms proposed for your acceptance harder than they would otherwise have been.

How can this measure ever affect the negotiation? If such a consequence could be supposed, I ask how it can ever be in the power of Government to give up any measure, let it be ever so mischievous, without running the same risk? If this is to be held up as a bugbear, how is it possible for a Government to change its measures? Apprehensions of this sort, if they are not to be liable to the scrutiny of the mind, will put it out of your power to make any change, although it would add to your coercive power. In the present instance, you are to be deterred from reconsidering your arrangements for an army, by an apprehension of an unfavorable effect on your enemy; although it must be confessed, that of all our preparations and measures this has been the least operative and promises to be so in future. If you have the power of further exertion, ought you not to make it in the war which will give you most power over France, and may she not count that in retrenching useless expenses you acquire additional strength?

I do not hesitate to say, if preference is due to one, it is to our naval preparations of defence. Sir, if you part with one which has never proved useful, will you not be better enabled to keep up the other, which is certainly more favorable to your interest and local situation?

Another objection which will most likely be made, but which is in effect the same, is, that those measures having been established, taken to resist any attack that might be made from France, and no material change having happened since, it will be considered as a proof that the spirit which dictated them is gone. What I have said before I consider as a full answer to this. In retaining those measures which alone have had effect, we give the best proof of our determination to persevere; in dismissing those measures which have only been burdensome to ourselves, we certainly increase our ability to do so. Thinking as I do, about the usefulness of this army in a contest with France, I conceive this the most proper time for disbanding it. I would enter the negotiation with an armor which would last more than a day; I would go to it so as to satisfy the country with whom we treat that we will not be obliged to abandon the ground which justice has pointed out. If its usefulness is not such as it ought to be maintained throughout the contest with France, in my opinion this is the best time which can offer for disbanding the army. In case the negotiation is to fail, the increase of passion and alarm would deprive us of the power of acting up to the sound dictates of understanding, and we should certainly continue under the pressure, though useless.

If there was a possibility of my proposition hindering the negotiation with France, or in the least retarding it, I am sure that I should be the last in the House to press it; there is nothing I wish more than a complete accommodation, and nothing for which I would bear more. I propose a correction of what I call a misdirected zeal; by correcting which, I conceive the country will acquire new energy, the power of Government be placed on a firmer and more substantial footing. Under the firm impression of these ideas, I have done what I considered my duty, and leave it to the consideration of the House whether the measure would or would not be prudent and practicable.

Mr. MARSHALL said if it was true that America, commencing her negotiation with her present military force, would appear in the armor which she could only wear for a day, the situation of our country was lamentable indeed. If our debility was really such, that the troops sought to be disbanded could not be kept up but for a day, or for a very short period, our situation was truly desperate. No cheaper mode of self-defence had been or could be devised, and it amounted to a declaration that we were unable to defend ourselves. He thought differently from the honorable gentleman who moved the resolution. He thought America could maintain, if it should be necessary, a much larger force, for a much longer time, than was contemplated with respect to the troops to which the resolution under consideration related.

It was also to be observed that the honorable gentleman had predicated all his arguments on the idea, that the troops must be immediately disbanded, or that the original law, unmodified, must have its full effect; that no middle ground might be taken. He was of a very different opinion; he thought middle ground might be taken, and that the law might be modified, so as to diminish the estimated expense, without dismissing the troops already in actual service.

The resolution proposed, he said, occupied such broad ground, as necessarily to unite against it a considerable variety of opinions respecting the future disposition of the army. Not only those who thought the original law ought to have its full course and effect, but those also who thought it ought to receive certain modifications, and even those who thought that in the event of the failure of the present negotiation, the army ought, under certain circumstances, to be disbanded, but that this was not the time for disbanding it, must unite against the motion now under consideration. It could only be supported by those who, like the mover of the resolution, thought that in the present moment, uninformed as we were concerning all those circumstances which should govern our decision, we ought to retrace the steps we had taken, and very materially to change the ground on which we found ourselves placed. This being the opinion on which alone it could be maintained, it became necessary to examine the arguments urged in support of this opinion.

It has been urged that the army ought to be disbanded because it was totally useless, because the United States were unable to bear the expense, and on some other suggestions, which should be considered in the course of the argument.

Its utility has been maintained on the impossibility of invading our country in the present state of things, on the difficulty of invading it at any time, and on the total indisposition to invasion, arising from the inadequacy of the object to the difficulty of attaining it.

But what assurance have gentlemen that invasion is now impracticable? The present state of Europe is totally unknown to us. The effects of the late decisive victories of France have not reached us. It is by no means certain that these victories may not have produced a negotiation with some of the continental Powers, which may liberate a considerable portion of her force, which she may send across the Atlantic. By the opening of the next campaign we shall be informed on this subject, and shall be able to act with proper knowledge of it—at present we are uninformed and are urged to act without the requisite knowledge.

On this point it was necessary to inquire into the relative situation of the two nations. All commercial and friendly intercourse between us was suspended. Whenever we met, the stronger party attacked and captured the weaker. The property of the captured was confiscated and their persons imprisoned. This was war in fact though not in form. We are, in fact, at war with France, though it is not declared in form. What security then is there that no disposition will exist to invade us? The unimportance of the object forms no such security.

Neither is there any security that there exists no disposition to invade us. On this subject he differed essentially from the honorable gentlemen who supported the resolution. He thought America of vast importance to France. Whatever might be the views of France, whether they were merely to humble her great rival or were still more extensive, it was impossible to consider the effect which a control over American affairs must have in promoting those views, without being satisfied on this subject. Independent of the effective force which might be used, the great advantage which the monopoly of our commerce would give in time of peace for the formation of a naval power, was of importance to France or England. The result of the two last wars between those two nations, in one of which the force of America was added to that of Britain, and in the other to that of France, evinces the importance of America, even at that time, in either scale. Unquestionably that importance cannot be diminished.

With respect to the difficulty of attaining the object, Mr. M. said that France could not be so much governed by the difficulty which might actually exist, as by the opinion she would previously entertain of that difficulty. Before the real difficulty could be ascertained, the invasion must take place. Of consequence, her opinion on this subject would regulate her conduct, and her opinion would depend on the measures which might be adopted, and the disposition which might be manifested by America. But it has been urged, not only that the army is useless, but that there is in the United States a positive inability to maintain it. To prove this our revenue and expenditure has been stated. Suppose this had been the language of '75? Suppose, at the commencement of our Revolution, a gentleman had risen on the floor of Congress, to compare our revenues with our expenses—what would have been the result of the calculation? Would not the same system of reasoning which the gentleman from Virginia has adopted, have proved that our resources were totally inadequate to the prosecution of the war? Yet it was prosecuted, and with success. If vast exertions were then made to acquire independence, will not the same exertions be now made to maintain it? The question now is, whether self-government and national liberty be worth the money which must be expended to preserve them.

The mover of the resolution, Mr. M. said, had urged, as his strongest reason for the measure, the saving of public money which it would produce. Any argument of which the object was economy, came home to the feelings of every member of the community, and came home to the feelings of every member of the House. Such arguments would, and ought to have great weight; but it should never be forgotten that true economy did not content itself with inquiring into the mere saving of the present moment; a true and wise economy would take an enlarged view of the subject, and determine, on correct calculation, whether the consequence of a present saving might not be a much more considerable future expenditure. The reduction of the army would certainly diminish the expense of the present year; but if it should have any operation on the existing negotiation with France, the present saving it would produce would bear no proportion to the immense waste of blood, as well as treasure, which it might occasion us. To determine in what manner this measure might, and probably would, bear on the existing negotiation, it became indispensable to take into our view what had preceded the actual state of things between the United States and France. In doing this it could not be necessary to enumerate the various injuries our country had sustained. They rested in the memory of every American, and need not be recited. It must, however, be particularly observed, that while prayers for peace were returned for indignities of every sort, while America was humbly supplicating for peace, and that her complaints might be heard, France spurned her contemptuously and refused to enter on a discussion of differences, unless that discussion was preceded by a substantial surrender of the essential attributes of independence. America was at length goaded into resistance, and resolved on the system of defence, of which the army now sought to be disbanded forms a part. Immediately the tone of France was changed, and she consented to treat us as an independent nation. Her depredations indeed did not cease; she continued still to bring war upon us; but, although peace was not granted, the door to peace was opened.

What could have produced this change? Every member of the House is called upon to put this question to himself and to weigh it according to his best judgment. To supplicating America, even discussion was denied. America armed, and immediately a different language was used, and the rights of an independent nation were allowed her. What, he repeated, could have produced this change? Can any other motive be assigned, than the defensive system which America had adopted? If in the mind of any gentleman, any other motive did exist, he is called upon to assign that motive. If no other did exist, is it wise immediately to change the system which has alone been effectual? Is it not to be apprehended that this change may revive those sentiments which existed before that system was adopted?

This subject, he said, was also to be considered in another point of view, which had been foreseen by the mover of the resolution and declared to be intimately connected with that which had been already stated. It was this: the policy of this measure depends entirely on the state of things when the negotiation shall be determined.

Will gentleman say, that, under any state of things, the army ought to be disbanded? Will they say that if peace should be made with the continental Powers of Europe, and a French army should be crossing the Atlantic to invade our territory, that yet our military force ought to be diminished? He believed no gentleman would say so. He was certain the mover of the resolution would not. Is it then wise to precipitate a measure, the policy of which depends entirely on an event which is not yet, but will soon be, ascertained?

In a few months the fate of the present negotiation will be decided. Should it terminate favorably, the army expires by the law which gave it being, and the additional expense to be incurred will be very inconsiderable. Should it fail, we shall then know the disposition of France and the situation of Europe. We shall be able to form a just estimate of the danger of invasion, and consequently to decide, with much better information than we now possess, on the question under discussion. If such a state of things should then exist as would justify disbanding the army, the loss produced by the delay of that measure would be very inconsiderable. If the then state of things should require even an augmentation of the existing force, the injury occasioned by our precipitation might be very considerable. We should certainly throw away all the expense incurred in recruiting men, all the discipline the present army had acquired, and be in a state as unprepared as if the expense for those objects had never been sustained. He concluded with observing that this was not the time for diminishing the force of the nation, and therefore he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLAS.—As usual, I fear that this, as I consider it, wrong step, will never be got over. How can it, if there is strength in the gentleman's arguments? Where is the end of it? In vain do we seek for it! He supposes the necessity for that army will continue while depredations continue on our commerce; thus, France may continue her depredations, which are directed only towards a part where this army can have no effect, and consequently, though there will be no power to use it, the armament is never to have an end. He says on the moment of failure in the negotiation, an army may be crossing the ocean, and then we shall want these troops. Sir, this might occur at any period, and if we are never to disband our army, under apprehensions of that event, it will never be done, and our expense will be perpetual; but of all times the one fixed on by the gentleman is the most improbable, and if you are to be in perpetual alarm on this account, where will the argument lead? The expense is stated to be small, as the event will be soon known. We know not how short is the time or how long; we cannot limit it. France may continue, and might continue to plunder us on the ocean, and therefore to fix on her forbearance as the time, is but in other terms to be satisfied to bear the burden for years, without a prospect of its being useful.

The gentleman considers this armament to be the measure which extorted the overtures from France. But this is not so. It is a little extraordinary that he should have ascribed an effect to a measure that existed previous to the knowledge of that measure; for the propositions, and the avowed willingness on the part of the Directory to meet our complaints by an honorable adjustment, were made known to our Ministers in August, which was before the law of July, 1798, which created the army we wish should be disbanded, could have reached that nation.

I could not understand one of the gentleman's arguments, when he spoke of the motive for invading this country by the different weight it would have in the scale of either of the contending Powers. Instead of this being a reason why she should make war upon us, it is a good reason, in my opinion, why she should wish for peace with us, to keep us out of the scale of her enemy. He surely could not think it an easy acquisition to France, from any attachment formed for that nation among the people of this country, so as to make it an easy conquest. I am sure he would not form such a degrading opinion of his countrymen. The general suggestion that we may be invaded will not operate the least in favor of retaining the troops, for to that we are always exposed. No time can be pointed out in which it would not be as practicable as at present, but many periods and circumstances in which it would be more so. If a conquest can be made of this country, and the difficulties of achieving it are not sufficient to prevent the attempt, I ask whether a time of peace would not comport more with the interests of the nation expected to attempt it? Their supply of arms and men, and having no enemy to encounter, would certainly render that the most proper time. The consequence, then, of those arguments would be that we must keep this army up and go on arming in all times, because we may be invaded. This continual alarm will be found so fatal to public happiness, that we shall at last be willing to yield ourselves up to any master who can promise us security.

But the gentleman seems to suppose that there is a middle ground upon which we can go, and that we might do something short of disbanding the army, by which expense can be saved. How does this proposition comport with the influence he conceives any change in our system will have on France, or with his fears of invasion? Is your army so numerous that you can bid defiance to France with half of it—for, in the idea of the gentleman, in case of a want of agreement, your negotiators are to return with an army at their heels!

In my opinion, the same arguments that go to the least retrenchment at the present time, go to the whole principle of the resolution, for, if we were to be invaded, it would not all be enough; we must have recourse to other means. If from motives of economy we ought to save part of the expense, and the saving of that part would leave us in nearly the same danger which saving the whole would, who can hesitate to decide which is the most expedient? I confess I have heard none of the arguments used by the gentleman that have convinced me of the impropriety of the resolution, but rather they have confirmed me in a sense of the necessity of it.

Considerable argument then took place on a motion of Mr. JONES to refer the resolution to a Committee of the whole House, which at last was agreed to; and the House adjourned.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

WEDNESDAY, January 8.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Vaughan was read the third time, and passed.

Sundry petitions and remonstrances from a number of the inhabitants of Morris county, in the State of New Jersey, were presented to the House and read, praying a repeal of the alien and sedition laws passed at former sessions of Congress; and, also, of the law which authorizes the President to augment the Army; for certain reasons therein expressed.

Ordered. That so much of the said petitions as relates to a repeal of the laws authorizing the augmentation of the Army be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed the motion for a repeal of certain parts of the acts relative to the Army, passed the sixteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, reported a bill to repeal part of an act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned;" which was read twice, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint. The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the motion depending yesterday, for a repeal of certain parts of the acts relative to the Army, passed the sixteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine—Mr. MORRIS in the Chair.

Mr. BAYARD rose and said, he felt much embarrassment in rising to speak in support of positions which had already been so ably and so eloquently maintained by the honorable gentleman from Virginia. He could not flatter himself with the expectation of throwing much light on a subject which had been illustrated by him. But the subject was of such magnitude and interest, that it was important to contemplate it in every point of view.

He was not surprised that such a resolution as the one under consideration, even at the present crisis, should have been brought forward by the honorable gentleman who moved it. He could perceive in it a connexion with a system which had long been pursued by a party in the United States—a system which had for its object the debilitation and degradation of the General Government. A knowledge of the party and a knowledge of their views prevented any astonishment at the present measure they proposed. This measure he did not regard as a single operation. It was part of a general plan, which, if it were successful, would soon be unfolded.

The conduct of France in relation to this country, had compelled the United States to adopt a system of defence. The nation had found that no reliance could be placed on the moderation or justice of the French Government. Their own energies were the only ground on which their independence could be maintained. They did not hesitate as to the alternative of defence or submission. Having resolved to resist the aggressions and pretensions of the French Government they found themselves forced into a state of hostility. The commercial intercourse with France was suspended, the treaty of alliance was abolished, a navy was created for the protection of trade, and an army ordered to be raised. Our ships of war were instructed to seize and destroy the armed ships of the French Republic, and a war, though deprecated, was expected without dread. The national sentiment coincided with the temper of the Government, and its measures were approved and applauded. The system which was adopted was connected in its parts, and the objection which went to one part applied with equal force to the whole. The naval hostilities authorized against France rendered an army necessary against invasion from Europe or the islands, which might reasonably be expected.

If gentlemen now said an army was not necessary, it must be because they thought the French Government was not hostile but friendly. If they thought that Government friendly, surely there could be no occasion for the navy. The same reason would induce us to revive the treaty with France and open the commercial intercourse.

Sir, said Mr. B. before we undertake to change the entire plan which we have pursued, and which certainly has been productive of salutary effects, gentlemen should well consider what condition of the country induced that plan, and whether that condition is altered; they should reflect upon the operation which the change might have upon our affairs abroad and on its probable effects at home. He should not enter into a recapitulation of the various complaints and recriminations which had occurred between the two countries. It was sufficient to observe that the Government of the United States, actuated by a love of peace and a motive of amity, early sent a Minister to France, to conciliate the differences which had arisen. This Minister was not simply rejected, but repelled with circumstances of marked disdain and contumely, designed, not as a personal, but as a national affront. The moderation of the Government and the forbearance of the people passed over in silence this gross violation of the respect and justice done to them.

Still, willing for peace and anxiously desirous to avoid engaging in the contentions of Europe, a new embassy was sent to France, composed of citizens the most illustrious for their talents and probity. We all know the fate of this embassy. The olive branch which was presented was disdainfully trampled under foot. Our Ministers were not received. A miserable pecuniary intrigue was set on foot, which unveiled the corruption and hypocrisy of the French administration, and remained a lasting monument of the disgraceful views and designs of that Government. When these rejected Ministers of Peace returned what was our situation? The American people perceived that their Government had sincerely and zealously endeavoured to preserve the relations of amity with France. They saw that peace could not be maintained without a surrender of their independence. The alternative was war or tribute. The people were then roused from their lethargy. The national pulse beat high, and from one end of the Union to the other the sentiment was uttered and reiterated, "millions for defence but not a cent for tribute." He trusted this was not the ephemeral spirit of a moment. He trusted that the American people, though slow to anger, would be found firm to their purpose. At this moment the temper of the country forced the Government to measures of defence. The Government, faithful to the interest and will of the people, assumed the attitude of resistance; they severed the connexion with France, and prepared to defend themselves on the ocean and on land. This state of things they had not chosen, but it had been imposed upon them.

They had been fully sensible of the burden and sufferings of war. But the election of peace no longer remained upon terms compatible with the independence of the country. This state of things gave birth to the measures of the last Congress; those measures had been adopted, not from choice but from necessity.

If the state of things justified the measures which were adopted in 1798, before gentlemen consented to abandon the system then taken up, they would certainly inquire whether anything had occurred which changed the situation of the country. To me, said Mr. B., the same views present themselves; nay, the causes of apprehension have increased. To the complaints which France had in 1798, we have added a course of hostilities since that time: we are now in actual war; we have everything to dread which the vengeance and power of the Great Nation can inflict. Have we anything to hope from their moderation and justice? To them we have already appealed in vain. A new effort to negotiate has been made, hostilities however continue, and the event of the mission is utterly uncertain. We have, then, the same reason to maintain the army which we had to raise it; consistency will oblige every gentleman to vote for its continuance who voted for its creation. He had no doubt that the people of the United States, perceiving the necessity of our situation, would cheerfully submit to the burden. A burden, great as it might be, not so heavy or calamitous as bondage to a foreign Power.

But, said Mr. B., some gentlemen affect to believe that in no event could the army be necessary. They conceive, in the first place, that an invasion of the country is impracticable by France; and, in the second, that if an invasion should happen, the patriotism of our citizens furnishes alone sufficient means of defence. He was not of opinion that invasion was impracticable. What rendered it impracticable? Did France want men? No nation was more populous; nor could any nation furnish more soldiers in proportion to her population. Did she want ships? We were informed that she still possessed a considerable navy of her own, and, in addition, could dispose of the marine force of her august ally the King of Spain; the combined fleets were certainly competent to the end. Was the project too hazardous or chimerical? Look at the expedition to Egypt; the distance to the United States was greater, but the voyage once begun, all difficulties were surmounted. Did we rely on her friendship or moderation? On this subject we had lessons of our own, and they were confirmed by the invasion of Egypt. Egypt was a dependence on the Porte. The Porte, at the time of invasion, was the ally of France, and was her natural and ancient ally. France had not a complaint against the Turkish Government; and notwithstanding, in breach of the law of nations and in violation of every principle of justice, invaded the Turkish dominions. This invasion furnishes memorable proof of the darkness of her intrigues and the perfidy of her assurances. It was not till Bonaparte was landed in Egypt that the Turkish Government suspected the hostile designs of France; and, when in Egypt, you find the French General as good a Musselman as here he would be a Christian. Nothing could be expected from the moderation of a Government which had uniformly shown itself the most ambitious, the most rapacious, and the most unprincipled, of any that ever ruled.

But we are told that in case of invasion an army is not necessary, because we might rely on the patriotism of the nation. Sir, said Mr. B., I am not insensible to the melody of the word, but I must doubt of the efficacy of one thing. There was a time when everybody understood what was meant by patriotism; it indicated an attachment to our country. But a modern patriot was a character not so well understood. Patriotism has become a furious spirit of revolution; the ties of blood, the inspirations of nature, the principles of truth and honor, are consumed by the devouring flame. The natalis solium had lost its charm. To be a patriot you must forget your country, abjure your religion, suppress the impulses of nature, and maintain the equality of vice and virtue. He knew there were a sect of patriots who attributed to themselves exclusive merit. Was it on these patriots the country was to rely in case of invasion? It was necessary to develop their principles before they could be entitled to confidence. Their object might be beyond his view, but their operations inspired distrust. We see, said he, every means employed to separate the Government and the people. Art, intrigue, and falsehood, are indiscriminately made use of to create an opinion that the friends of the Government aim at the establishment of monarchy. He did not suppose that those who gave currency to the idea believed in the fact. The evil was extensive and increasing. The attempts to establish the opinion to which he alluded were not confined to a few miserable editors, whose bread depended on defamation and calumny, but ambition and party had laid hold of the same instrument to accomplish their purposes. The opinion had been declared by men of high character; we had seen it in official addresses and official answers; and the ebullitions of conviviality were proof of the impression it had made. Sir, said Mr. B., I know the fact to be otherwise. The friends of the Government are devoted to the Constitution. They wish to maintain it on its just principles. They have resisted the insidious attempts to weaken and destroy it, made under the deceitful pretence of love of liberty and attachment to the rights of the people.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The design to establish monarchy, attributed to the friends of the Government, he considered as a most dangerous calumny. Unsupported as it was by any acts, or even the expression of opinion, yet there were many who were weak enough to believe it. He thought, in this country, a more fatal poison could not have been infused into the public mind. The body of the people were attached to a republican form of Government. He had no doubt that to maintain this form of Government they could sacrifice every other consideration. When they are brought to suppose that those who administer the Government aim at the establishment of monarchy, they will be ripe for insurrection, or ready to join an invading army.

He could not imagine that the delusion on this subject reached to an alarming extent. He believed a great majority of the people were attached to their Government, and had full confidence in its rectitude. But there were no doubt some who were weak and credulous enough to believe the slanders which the enemies of the Government had propagated. The patriotism of these few would not be shown in attachment to the country, but in a furious opposition to those whom they have been taught to think were enemies to liberty and equality.

Sir, said he, let the French come with their cap of liberty mounted on their standards, singing ca ira, planting liberty poles, and denouncing the Government as an aristocratical and British faction, and I fear you would see some patriots forgetting their country, and, under the ardent impression of their political fanaticism, ready to imbrue their hands in their brothers' blood. Revolution was not confined to politics—religion and morals were revolutionized. The sacred love of country, once ranked amongst the best principles of man's nature, was now shamefully sacrificed to the very sound of equality.

These sentiments were no declamation, they were drawn from what had actually happened. The example of Holland was before us. No nation had ever struggled with more fierceness and obstinacy to establish their independence; the people of no nation had been more celebrated for their patriotism. And yet, within the compass of a few years, we had seen that spirit yielding to a new passion, which had involved the country in slavery and wretchedness. For a few empty sounds they had bartered the independence of their country. The patriots united with the invaders, and, as soon as they were told that they were all free and equal, surrendered their Government and treasures to France. They are punished beyond the desert of folly. An army of 24,000 plunderers is established in their bosom, and the vultures will not be satisfied while there is anything to devour. They have now the equality of slaves, and the liberty of singing the songs and playing with the baubles which France has given in exchange for the right of governing them with the bayonet.

Mr. B. said he would turn his eyes to a picture still more melancholy than that of Holland. He alluded to Switzerland. The people of those cantons were illustrious for their love of liberty and their devotion to their country. Liberty they had, and with it all the blessings which good government could bestow. They did not escape, however, the poison of the French mania. The storm of the Revolution reached them, and Switzerland has been effaced from the list of independent nations. Still brave, still attached to their country, yet seduced by the flattery and false promises of their invaders, instead of uniting in a common defence, they divided among themselves, and thus fell an easy prey.

Cannot these dreadful instances of credulity and delusion open your eyes? Must this country swell the catalogue of national folly and human misery? He trusted there was a Providence who would protect us. He trusted that a great majority of the people would be preserved from falling into those fatal errors which had proved the ruin of other nations. He was not disposed to doubt the patriotism of the people. It was not distrusting their patriotism to provide an army of disciplined soldiers. No one could predict what would be the first impression of an invasion. France was not without emissaries and some friends in this country. At the moment of invasion the French partisans would be actively employed to distract the patriotism and paralyze the energy of the country. At this moment it was of vast importance that the Government should have some troops to rally the confidence as well as the forces of the nation; no regular army could be contemplated as an adequate defence. But their utility was still great. They were a point which would concentrate the militia, the great reliance of the country.

Sir, said Mr. B., because our militia are brave and willing to turn out, in case of invasion, shall we not add to them the aid and support of a corps of disciplined troops? Shall they be exposed at once to the bayonets of veteran soldiers, inured to fighting? Without meaning to disparage the militia, he would say that no men could be made soldiers the day they were led into the field. If we designed, therefore, effectual resistance, it was necessary to have some men at least instructed in discipline before an invasion happened.

But we have been told, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. B., that our pecuniary means are not equal to the support of the army which has been directed to be raised. The argument on this subject has not been fairly stated by the honorable gentleman who moved the resolution. We have two events to contemplate, either that a treaty will or will not be concluded with France. If a treaty should be concluded, then, by the law raising this army, the troops would of course be disbanded; because they are entitled to serve during the existence of the differences between France and the United States, unless sooner disbanded.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1800.

If a treaty should be concluded, it must be in a short time. The event must be known in a few months, and of consequence, in case of peace, the expense to the country would be only the pay and subsistence of about 3,500, (the number already enlisted for the twelve regiments,) for two or three months, which could not exceed 200,000 dollars. If, however, France should still insist on terms destructive of the honor and independence of the nation; if, sir, nothing should remain but war, will gentlemen say the army ought to be disbanded? It is impossible such can be their infatuation. If France should again refuse us peace, it must be because she has some great hostile intention against us. The present state of things is prejudicial to her. She gains nothing and loses something. If she did not mean to do more, if she did not aim at some great advantage, she would readily accede to the moderate terms of accommodation which we ask. What can she design? A war upon our commerce is not a sufficient object. It would be of advantage to her corsairs, but the Government would acquire neither reputation nor advantage by it. If France will not make peace, she can design nothing less than conquest. And will we stop to calculate the expense of a war for our national independence? It had been well observed, by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, that at the commencement of our late Revolution America did not do so. Destitute of all means of defence but the energy of public spirit, calculation would have been useless. At this time we had means upon which we might calculate, and he trusted the spirit of the nation still remained. I believe, said Mr. B., that, in a war for their independence, the people of these States would submit to any taxes which their defence might require. If it were fifty per cent. on their capital, they would rather part with it, than with their rights and liberties, which they purchased with so much blood and treasure. In fact, in the event which he was contemplating, the only question for the people would be, whether they would not spend a part of their fortunes in their defence, rather than yield the whole in endless contributions to France? Upon such a question he presumed there could be no hesitation.

He should detain the Committee a short time longer in offering some observations upon the probable operation of the resolution abroad, in case it were adopted. Gentlemen in favor of the resolution affect to believe, that its adoption would not influence the negotiation which is pending with France. None of us have entertained the idea attributed to us by the honorable mover of the resolution, that these troops were to be sent to Europe or were to act against France. We readily agree that nothing would be more chimerical and absurd.

It is not from any view of a possible operation of the army against France that the disbanding could influence the negotiation, but from the impression such a measure would necessarily make on the French Government, as to the state of affairs in this country. If, after having raised an army against them, without any change of conduct on their part, they were to see us disband it, what would they infer? Either that extreme imbecility pervaded our councils, or that there was a want of means on the part of the Government to maintain a small military force. Or, perhaps they would make an inference still more, that those whom they called and supposed their party in this country had become more powerful than the Government. In either case they would perceive less difficulty in the accomplishment of any views which they had on the country, than our plans of defence may have caused them to apprehend; and, of consequence, the inducements to an accommodation of differences would be diminished. It was a wise axiom in politics, that a nation which would negotiate to advantage should be prepared to fight. The resolution was predicated on an opposite principle, and was repugnant to the plain evidences of experience and common sense.

Mr. B. said the disbanding the army would have the worst effect at home. If the resolution succeeded, the soldiers were disbanded in the midst of Winter, were left without employment, and were thrown on the community to subsist by plunder or charity. That if the measure were delayed to that season when common justice would suffer the troops to be disbanded, the event of our mission to France would be known, and the term of enlistments would expire by their own limitation, or the necessity of retaining the troops would be no longer questionable. He begged the gentlemen to consider what would be the situation of the country if the army were now disbanded, and at the end of three months France should declare war. Would an officer or soldier return to the service of a Government which might be obliged to dismiss them the next day, without any change occurring in their political affairs. Mr. B. concluded with observing that, viewing the resolution in every point of light in which it presented itself to him, he felt the necessity of giving it his decided negative.

Mr. GALLATIN observed, that after the Committee had been so eloquently entertained, by the display of fancy exhibited by the gentleman last up, he did not know whether he should have it in his power to command their attention, as he could offer nothing but a dry discussion of the question itself. The motion did not contemplate that the whole army should be disbanded—a position on which the arguments of gentlemen opposed to it had been founded. It did not even go to reduce the army establishment to the same situation in which it was in 1798. In April of that year our whole number of troops on the establishment was 3,200 men. Our permanent establishment now, independent of the troops which are the object of the motion on the table, amounts to 5,400. There is therefore an increase of 2,200 men since April, 1798, which are not contemplated to be affected by this motion. This increase had been made by adding an additional regiment of artillery, and increasing the number of men in each company on the former establishment. In addition to these there are 1,000 marines, who are likewise upon the permanent establishment, and who may occasionally serve in garrison, in the nearest place. In case of war, or danger of invasion from any foreign country, such increase of the companies on the permanent establishment was to take place, by virtue of the law to organize the army, as would make an addition of 2,500 men. This was independent of what was called the eventual army. The resolution affects only what is called the additional army, which was to amount to about 9,300 men. These are proposed to be disbanded, which, if done, would still leave a force of 5,400 besides 1,069 marines, and power in the President to raise 2,500 more in case of invasion or war. This is a correct statement of the existing force. What is called the permanent establishment, of 2,400 men, I conceive to be sufficient to garrison the forts and harbors, and for the protection of the frontiers against the Indians. Indeed, that appears also to be the opinion of Government; for such of the 9,300 as are enlisted are encamped in cantonments.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Permit me first to say that all the speech of the gentleman from Delaware, with the exception of a few observations which I may notice hereafter, is a strong argument in favor of the motion which he attempted to oppose. The argument which he used, and supported with all the ability he possesses, was that no dependence could be placed on the amicable disposition of the French, and that it was not probable a peace would be the event of the negotiation. On this supposition he argues the necessity of a continuation of this force. It is from this uncertainty of things I wish the army to be disbanded. Sir, if I was convinced that the event of the negotiation would be a treaty in a short period, I should not think the advantages that would result from an immediate disbandment of the army so very important as to have rendered this motion necessary; for, in case of an adjustment of differences with France, the army was already, according to law, to be disbanded. It is because I am not certain a treaty will be made in a short time, because it may not be made during the session of Congress, and therefore because the troops may continue in pay for a great length of time, that I conceive the motion to be important. I do believe that if there should be no treaty formed with France this army would be useless; nay, I will go further and say it would be pernicious. When I say it would be useless, I conceive the burden of proof does not rest on me, but that it is incumbent on those gentlemen who think the army necessary to prove its utility. The arguments of the gentleman from Virginia yesterday (Mr. MARSHALL) did not appear to place any great dependence upon this army, let what would be the event of the negotiation. Yet he has repeated the idea formerly so much insisted upon—the inducements which this country offered to the French for invasion. In favor of this doctrine he gives however, but one argument, drawn from the events of the former wars between France and Great Britain. He very justly observes, that in all those wars where America was united to Great Britain, she triumphed over France; but that event was changed during the last war, when the weight of America was thrown in the scale of France. And from thence he draws the conclusion that America offers great inducements to invasion. The fact brought to view by the gentleman, proves to me the very reverse of what he intended to suggest. If the weight of America, thrown in the scale of Great Britain, decided every contest in favor of that country, can it be the interest of France, by an invasion, to throw us altogether into the arms of Great Britain? Is it not, on the contrary, her interest to cultivate our friendship and to promote at least our neutrality? But the history of the last war places the argument in a far more forcible point of view. The force of America was not only withdrawn from an active operation against France, but it was actively employed against Great Britain. It was that contest which rendered the weight of America of immense importance. But where and in what manner was that contest carried on? Great Britain invaded America; and it was that invasion, it was their shedding their blood and exhausting their treasure in the hopeless attempt, which divided their force, weakened their efforts everywhere else, and procured almost everywhere the means of victory to their enemies. Yet it is said, that the recollection of the events of that war are an inducement to invade this country, and thence is drawn an argument in favor of the army. To my mind nothing can appear more contradictory than that conclusion. It amounts to this: England was not only unable to conquer America, but the attempt divided and enfeebled her so much as to change her relative situation with her ancient European enemy; therefore, it is the interest of France to invade America. It is evident that the recollection and experience of the last war added greatly to our confidence in our power of repelling an invasion, and our security against the renewal of the attempt from any nation. France has neither naval nor money resources to spend for it—not scarcely to accomplish what she wishes in Europe. Notwithstanding her boasted power, she is not in any degree equal in those two resources to what Britain is now, after a long and expensive war; much less is she equal to what that nation was in 1775, when she invaded this country. I need not add, in confirmation of these ideas, that our population is nearly double at this time of that of 1774, and that with our population our resources are doubled at least. This is a fact which cannot be disputed.

We have been told, by the gentleman from Delaware, that if France did not make a treaty with us, it was because she meant to invade us. I cannot conceive how he could draw this conclusion. He has recapitulated all the conduct of France towards us, and related the indignities with which our former missions were treated. She was not, at either of those times, disposed to treat with this country, but did invasion succeed the failure of the negotiation? Sir, from past experience, and from a knowledge of her situation, and the small inducements to that conduct, the danger of invasion is not to be apprehended, even on a failure of our present negotiation. If France wishes to continue the dispute, I believe it will be because she has another object in view, and that object is solely to plunder our commerce. This may be an inducement, but the other cannot, on account of her want of power to execute it, or, if she had power, the want of inducement.

The argument, however, on which the gentleman from Virginia principally rests his opposition is grounded on a supposition that the present motion will have an unfavorable effect upon the negotiation, inasmuch as it is, in his opinion, a partial dereliction of the system of resistance adopted by this country, and to which he ascribes the present temper of France. I do not believe such an effect can be produced by it; if I did, or had the least apprehension, I should be among the last to advocate it; for I certainly wish for nothing that can impede the negotiation. I do not believe it, sir, because, for the reasons I have just now given, I consider this army as useless even in case of a continuation of hostilities with that nation, and because I do sincerely believe that France entertains a similar idea on the subject with ourselves; and that our having three or four thousand men effective, or from nine to ten thousand nominal men, more or less, will not produce the least change in the opinion of our ability to resist an invasion, or in her expectation of success should she continue to be hostile. In the next place, I do not conceive this motion to be a dereliction of the system of resistance against France, because the additional army never made a part of that system, which was adopted by the last Congress. That system, besides putting in a situation of defence by sea our ports and harbors, which are completely garrisoned by the permanent army, independent of these troops, consisted in repelling force by force at sea, in resisting the aggressions of France on the element where they had been committed, and in suspending our treaties and commercial intercourse. The only addition to those measures was merely one of caution, by giving the President power to call out a provisional army in case of "war, invasion, or danger of invasion." All these measures were proposed by the Committee of Defence, and were passed between April and June, or thereabout. After these acts were passed, a motion was brought into the House, and carried, to create these twelve regiments. This was entirely an independent and unconnected motion from the measures reported by the committee at an earlier period. Further: although this law did pass in July, it was not attempted to be carried into execution till the next Winter, which was about six months after the law passed. The first appointment of officers was made after the meeting of Congress in that Winter, and of course the enlistments did not take place for a considerable time. I therefore argue that this was not a part of the necessary system of defence, or, rather, resistance, before determined on and executed. I well remember what were the arguments adduced in favor of the measure at that time, and the circumstances which led to its adoption, which was carried by a very large majority of the House. We were told of the proximity of St. Domingo to the Southern parts of America; we were told of the weakness of that part of the country, arising from their black population, and the danger to which they were exposed from an invasion of blacks from Hispaniola; we were told that it was not doing justice to so important a part of the country if we neglected to add to it the same security which other parts enjoyed. Not that much danger of invasion was apprehended, but that that part of the country should be placed beyond the power of complaint. I know many members received impressions so far as to induce them to vote for it, of which number I was one. Yes, sir, I then voted for the law, under consideration, but I consider the situation of things is now materially changed. So far from this being the situation at present, a treaty has been formed with the Government of St. Domingo, and therefore invasion cannot be apprehended from that quarter. Another reason in favor of this law at the period of its proposition was, that several members of this House had doubts whether or not the law for raising a provisional army was strictly Constitutional, because power was given to the President to raise it "in case he should, in his discretion, think proper." They therefore voted for this rather than to see that carried into execution which they doubted the constitutionality of. At present, neither of these reasons can be operative; the law giving this discretionary power to the President expires at the end of the present session of Congress, and the danger from St. Domingo is set aside by a treaty. I therefore think that, inasmuch as this does not make any part of the system of defence, or resistance against French aggression, the repealing of it cannot affect our negotiation, or impress that nation with an opinion of our imbecility.

The gentleman from Delaware goes farther: he says, that if we are disposed to think so friendly of France as to disband our troops, we shall next propose to disband our navy, renew our intercourse, and abolish all those measures to which we were driven by her hostile conduct. I will, for my part, say, that I see no connexion between the one measure and the other. Although I was opposed to all the measures, nearly, to which he alludes, yet I would not, in our present situation, vote for the repeal of either of those laws. I was averse to the general system of hostility adopted by this country; but, once adopted, it is my duty to support it until negotiation shall have restored us to our former situation, or some cogent circumstances shall compel a change. At present, I think it proper that the system of hostility and resistance should continue, and I would vote against any motion to change that system.

At the same time, I am of opinion that a Naval Establishment is too expensive for this country; but, as we have assumed an attitude of resistance, it would be wrong to change it at present. There is but one of those laws about which I have any doubt, that is, respecting our commercial intercourse with France. I will not say that our suspension is not injurious to us upon the whole; perhaps it might be better policy to repeal that law; but I state this merely as the only point connected with our system of resistance on which I have not made up my mind.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Virginia, after opposing the motion, told us there was some middle way, some modification of the army, which might be adopted and would save a great part of the expense. We ask the dismissal of 3,500, which is the number enlisted towards the 9,300 ordered by law. We then keep 5,400, besides 1,000 marines. The object of the gentleman would be to prevent a certain number being enlisted, perhaps all those who are still wanting. I ask, then, if to reduce our Military Establishment is a dereliction of our system of resistance, and may, as insisted on by that gentleman, have a fatal effect on the negotiation, I ask whether any modification will not produce precisely the same effect? Sir, let the modification be in whatever manner, whether to reduce the number of regiments, or of men in each regiment. it will still be receding from measures established eighteen months ago. In whatever manner introduced, it will be neither more nor less than saying that the situation of affairs is altered, and that it is not necessary to keep up all these forces. Eighteen months ago we thought 1,500 necessary, but now we think proper to modify agreeably to our situation. All the difference between the gentleman's proposition and ours is, he thinks the forces may be reduced to 8,000—we think they may be reduced to 5,000; and there is only a question between eight, and five; the principle is the same, and the effect on the negotiation the same. But, sir, I believe a modification in either way would not have the least effect. I think that the concession of that gentleman in favor of a modification is exclusively in support of my position, that this army could not affect the negotiation, and therefore that it was useless; but I will go farther, and say it is pernicious. I think so, because taking these men from their occupations and employments, and putting them into a service where their labors are perfectly unproductive and where they contract habits of idleness, is of itself an evil. But, further—the army exhausts our resources, by putting us to a greater expense than can be justified, except from urgent necessity.

I believe that if there is any danger to be apprehended from France, it is by sea, and therefore I think that gentlemen who go on that plan, ought, in conformity to their own system, to apply our resources to the object which will protect our commerce. I shall not enter into a detail of our actual financial situation, because the statement made yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia was sufficiently accurate, and because documents are not yet before the House on which to ground one perfectly correct. We cannot however value our receipts derived from revenue at more than nine millions. Our actual expenditure for the present year, according to the existing establishment, will be about fourteen millions of dollars, to be supplied by a loan. And the expense of the year 1801 will be increased by the interest on that loan, and by that on the deferred debt, viz: $1,100,000, which then begins to be due. Those two objects will make an addition of one million and a half for the next year. The ability and willingness of the people to pay their taxes, as an abstract principle, cannot be doubted; but, however willing they may be to pay taxes, this year's deficiency must be supplied by a loan. Our income is now insufficient; the Secretary of the Treasury has told us that we must have recourse to a loan; no tax which we can now lay will remove the deficiency, because its receipts would not come into the Treasury till 1801. Our situation then is, that, upon a revenue of nine millions, we borrow five millions at the rate of eight per centum. I think this simple statement to be a sufficient reason why we should retrench an expenditure of two millions and an half, the appropriation necessary for that additional army which it is the object of this motion to discharge.

I think this motion, accompanied with the statement which has been made, leaves but one opinion on the floor—we either must decrease our establishments or increase our revenue or our debt. I will not say that it is impossible to increase our revenue. I know it is possible to raise more even by direct taxes; but I know, at the same time, that it cannot be done without inconvenience to our citizens, and the more so as our produce has experienced a considerable depression. Gentlemen who are not disposed to diminish the establishments will find it extremely difficult to raise new taxes, or to increase those already laid, in the present circumstances of the people. This, I think, requires no proof.

We are told, by the gentleman from Delaware, that the people of this country would pay fifty per cent. for money rather than submit to a foreign invasion. I admit that if the danger was imminent and real they would agree to pay anything. We do not conceive there would be any reluctance to pay taxes were such our situation, but, when it is not, it will be difficult to convince them of the propriety of additional taxation. Yet the confidence expressed by that gentleman in the willingness of the people to pay, does not very well comport with another part of his argument, wherein he insinuated a want of confidence in a considerable part of the people, whom he supposes so far as even to wish that our Government should be overturned. In support of his opinion, he alluded to several Legislative declarations and official addresses and answers. He infers, therefrom, that it would be unnecessary to keep up this standing force, because the militia would be fully confided in for the defence of the country. I am astonished at the palpable inconsistency of the gentleman—that the people would willingly pay fifty per cent. of their property for defence against an enemy, and yet no reliance is to be placed on those very people when the enemy comes!

Much weight appears to be placed on the argument of the necessity of these troops in case of the failure of the negotiation; and that we must wait till that failure actually takes place, for we do not know what will be the situation of affairs at that time. The force of this argument does not strike me, because I always consider it my duty to give my vote on the present situation of affairs, and not on what may occur some months hence. At that time we shall be told, notwithstanding there may be no apparent want of this force, that it would be very improper to disband the army then, because we could not tell what might happen three months after. These three months pass over, and then three months more, but when is the proper time? This argument would hold good while the war in Europe continues, under the uncertainty of what may happen. The present and existing state of things and probability of events are the only ground of legislation. But if we legislate on mere possibilities, however remote and improbable, there never can be a time when an army shall be thought unnecessary. The same reasoning might be urged by gentlemen even if the negotiation should succeed, for, from these apprehensions we should not then be out of danger, and while in danger we must prepare for it. I will go further, and say that, if the accommodation with France does succeed, there will be stronger ground in favor of the continuance of the troops, on account of the danger of a rupture with Great Britain. If we form a treaty with France, in my opinion this will not be the least probable event; and, from her, invasion is more likely than it can be from France at any period. It is well known that at this time our disputes with that nation are not trifling. The depredations of Britain are now at least equal to those of France, and are a sufficient ground of offence. In addition to this, two of the articles of our treaty with that nation are in a state of suspension. The one for adjudicating her spoiliations upon our commerce was suspended by His Britannic Majesty; the other, on this side the Atlantic, relating to British debts, being a subject of dispute between the Commissioners, is also suspended. If, to the unsettled British spoiliations, and debts, and British captures, you add another cause of dissatisfaction, by a change of our situation in relation to France, her enemy, from war to peace, and from suspension of commerce to free trade, I appeal to any gentleman's good sense to say whether a rupture with that country will not be more to be apprehended than invasion from France ever was, now is, or then will be? If we retrace our steps we shall see we have always been insulted by one nation in proportion as we attached ourselves to the other. This gave cause to the mission of Mr. JAY; we were supposed by Britain to have entertained an undue attachment towards France. When the treaty with Britain was passed, France was under the same impressions. I do not say that a treaty with France would be the cause of a war with Britain, but it might produce uneasiness. Our present system of arming at home; our suspension of intercourse with France; our dissolution of treaty; our naval and mercantile armaments, by which we take French vessels, are highly favorable to Britain. Take all this away, and we may pronounce it cannot be very pleasing to Great Britain.

What I have stated are not my arguments in favor of a continuation of the army; they have no impression on my mind in that view. I am not afraid of invasion from any Power. I know it is within the possibility of events, but I do not think it probable. I have only used them to show that this is as proper a time to disband these troops as can exist, and indeed more proper, whether the event of the negotiation be a treaty or not. I think the present time is proper; that if it is not thought so by Congress we cannot anticipate any one whatever.

I will only add a few ideas in answer to the gentleman last up, as to the impression the measure would make on the soldiers themselves. This as a general argument is not a good one, because soldiers and officers enlist or accept their commissions during the existing disturbance, "unless sooner discharged;" therefore we have reserved a right to discharge them at any time. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MARSHALL) thought a middle way would be preferable. The motion on the table does not exclude a modification, if any gentleman should propose it.

I will add that I understand our permanent establishment at this moment is not full, and therefore, if the soldiers are now discharged from this additional army, they may avoid all the hardships so humanely contemplated by the gentleman last up, by enlisting in that army. With respect to the officers, if they have a prospect of being discharged from the service in a short time, the sooner they return to their homes and occupations the better; for the habits acquired in encampments are, in my opinion, nowise calculated to promote their future usefulness to society or to themselves.

Mr. HARTLEY said he did not intend to have risen on this subject, but, on the recollection that he was entrusted with a petition to the House from his constituents, last session, on this subject and against a standing army, he was bound to it from a duty he owed them. These troops he believed did not fall under the denomination of the permanent Military Establishment, and therefore he was not of the opinion that it was an attempt to reduce the Military Establishment. This law was passed under the existing differences with the French Republic. We had been, and continued to be insulted, and he did not conceive there was any change in circumstances to warrant a change in measures. He said he voted for the raising of these men, and could see no reason to alter his vote. Mr. H. said he would wish to revive an idea thrown out by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MARSHALL,) on the propriety of a modification. He wished gentlemen to consider whether a modification could not be made so as to reduce the expense, and yet not to abandon the measure. The people in the country, he said, were very much alarmed at seeing bodies of troops marching about, and from the assessments lately made they were apprehensive that the expense of them would be burdensome. The people were not acquainted with the meaning of these things, and therefore their apprehensions were alive to the expense and danger. If there was even a suspension of farther enlistments he thought it might have a good effect; but something was necessary to be done in order to quiet the apprehensions of the people with respect to a standing army and an increase of taxes, which now threatened them. He hoped gentlemen who voted against the resolution would also concur in the necessity of a suspension in the enlistments, and perhaps some other modifications which may be thought necessary to save expense. He should vote against the present resolution, but he hoped to see one adopted to effect a saving some other way.

Reduction of the Army.

Mr. LEE said, if he was to consult his own feelings, or were he to regard momentary popularity, he should certainly remain silent, or support the resolution on the table. But there were seasons when, situated as he was, silence would be censurable, and a regard to personal considerations criminal; this was, in his judgment, one of those seasons. He must therefore claim the indulgence of the Committee, for a few moments, while he should explain the reasons which governed his decision. For his own part he wished the state of the resolution had been decided yesterday, as it was placed in a fair and plain point of view by the honorable member who moved it, and by his honorable friend who rose first in reply. Although much additional argument had been since proffered to the Committee, still the real ground on which the question rested was narrow, and ought never to be forgotten. It was simply this, shall we, for the sake of a small saving, break in on our system of defence, uninformed as we are of the pending negotiation for peace, or continue to adhere to our defensive system, until we know with certainty what we may expect on the subject of peace? The honorable member from Delaware had, with much ability and eloquence, pressed some of the observations made by his colleague yesterday, and added considerably to the range of argument against the resolution. It would certainly, therefore, have been useless consumption of the time of the Committee to have risen on the present occasion, had not the remarks which fell just now from the honorable member from Pennsylvania demanded attention. He would confine himself to those remarks chiefly, and hoped to be able to show their irrelevancy.

The gentleman began by stating that the effect of the resolution was not clearly understood, for that it would not affect the original army, which last year had been considerably augmented, but would only affect the additional regiments now raising; that, should the motion prevail, we should be left with an army of 5,400 men, besides the corps of marines, which, in his opinion, was adequate to any probable demand. I agree that the gentleman is correct in his conclusion of the effect of the resolution, but insist that however gentlemen have heretofore misconceived the same, he cannot be induced from this correction of the effect of the resolution to relinquish his opposition to it; for the more you reduce the saving to be produced, of course the more you diminish the influence of the chief argument used by most of the friends of the resolution.

The gentleman asserts confidently that the addition of the twenty-two regiments, which when completed make about 9,300 men, cannot be viewed as in any degree operative on the pending negotiation, for if invasion be really apprehended a much larger force would be requisite. It is true that looking at the army in this view it cannot be deemed very influential; compared to the enemy the force is small. But when you regard the army as part of a general system of defence, when you regard it as indicative of the public spirit, it must have its proportional influence on the councils of France; and when you view it as the rallying point of our militia, in case of invasion, 14,000 well disciplined, well appointed troops would not be found an inconsiderable obstruction, seconded as they would be by proper reinforcements of the militia, to any invading foe, however vast its resources.

It was justly observed, by my friend from Virginia, that the change in the councils of France towards America could only be ascribed to her manly preparations of defence, in consequence of her failure in attempts to adjust amicably existing differences. To what other cause can this change be placed; will gentlemen show us? This being the fact, I pray you, Mr. Chairman, to consider what will be the probable effect on our present effort to restore peace, should the resolution on the table be now adopted. It goes not only to manifest a shameful mutability in our councils, but tends to impress an opinion of fiscal debility in our nation, which, if true, would encourage aggression, and invite an attack even on our independence.

Suppose that paper, adopted by Congress, should reach Paris in the very moment when the Ministers of each nation were engaged in the formation of a treaty of peace, what would be the probable effect? Would it not imbolden the enemy, and depress your Envoys? Would it not lead to a submission, on secondary points at least, and thus produce sacrifices which may materially injure the commerce or other interests of the American people? Should we run this risk for the saving of $134,000, especially when, should peace not be concluded, we should be brought into considerable pecuniary loss by giving up the troops already raised? When our Envoys left their native shores they left a people fixed in their resolution to maintain their rights, disregarding loss of money or risk of life. They left a Government settled in its measures of preparation, and pursuing steadfastly the adopted system of defence. Let no change interrupting this proper conduct be introduced, for baneful must be its effects on the councils of our foe and on the spirit of ourselves.

The honorable member who introduced the resolution candidly declared that, was he sure of success in our pending negotiation for peace, he would not have troubled the House with a business little in that event, and the cause of some irritation. The same sentiment has been repeated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Here, indeed, Mr. Chairman, I cannot but express my surprise. If I understand the gentleman (peace not restored) still he would dismiss the additional army. We are in a state of actual war, our property seized and confiscated when taken, our seamen when captured imprisoned; and yet, in this state of actual war, if our Envoys return, the object of their mission unfulfilled, our country is to be deprived of the greater part of its military force!

Reduction of the Army.

On what ground rests counsel like this? I will not impute opinions delivered here to improper motives, but I must be permitted to assert that advice so strange excites suspicions truly alarming. The honorable member has attempted to turn an argument used by my honorable friend in support of the resolution—that is a hazardous experiment, and on the present occasion certainly ineffectual. Suppose the case before mentioned to take effect when France and Great Britain shall, with the rest of Europe, be in a state of peace. America has no alliance with Great Britain. The invasion of this country on the part of France will not be an object claiming the interposition of its rival potentate. What may not force and intrigue united accomplish? If not a conquest of part, the invasion may terminate in an ascendancy in the American councils, so far as to unite France and America in all future operations. Thus will France produce an object to her all important, and certainly such an object, for the reasons before mentioned, is worthy of the risk, expense, and trouble of invasion.

But it seems, at all events, regular troops are not necessary: militia, of themselves, are an adequate defence. This I deny; and much as I wish to see our militia placed on a respectable footing, much as I count on their aid whenever danger approaches, yet I never can be brought to trust the defence of the country solely to them. The experience of the last war justifies the opinion. Look at the battle of Long Island—braver men on the part of America were never brought into action, but vain was their courage. The best blood of America was prodigally and ineffectually expended during the war, for want of the aid to be derived from discipline and skill. See what the same sort of men did at the close of the war, when properly trained. The battle of the Eutaws is a distinguished example of the effect of discipline on the American soldiery. But really it is trifling with the Committee to press farther this truth; the history of man, from the beginning of the world to this day, throughout, maintains the folly of placing the defence of a nation on what we call militia only: economy too forbids it. But, because we firmly maintain this truth, insinuations go forth inculcating a belief that we are inimical to the militia, and friendly to a standing army. This is untrue and unwarranted by our declarations. We hold no such sentiments. We wish for the best and cheapest defence, and that we believe to consist of an adequate regular force, calculated for the occasion, and dismissed as soon as the object is answered; to be seconded by seasonable reinforcements from the militia.

But, says the honorable member, let us reduce the army, and use the saving in augmentation of the navy. I very much respect this last establishment; I prefer it, and will always be ready to cherish and invigorate it, but not now, in the way suggested, nor at the expense of the army. Until we are assured of peace we must hold both, and I doubt not we shall hold both.

But we come now to the point of pressure. The honorable member has given us a statement of our income and our outgoings—nine millions annual revenue; fifteen millions expenditure annually; a deficit of six millions. Agreed; make it eight if he pleases; it is a serious business, but still it is nothing compared to our national resources, or the stake at issue. We have the consolation to know that our money is raised upon an equal system of taxation, that it is honestly disbursed, and that the people's Government apply it to the people's service, and for their good only. Talk not to us, then, about the expense of any measure, with a view to destroy a measure in itself proper and necessary; especially in a contest on the successful termination of which hangs the most important rights.

We are a great, free, and powerful nation, and no gentleman can put his finger on any act of the American people fixing on them the imputation of niggardness. Whenever money is wanting for the public good, it will be readily given. In my native State (a State which I profoundly respect and truly love, much as I differ politically with its Legislature) the taxes were raised 25 per cent. at one dash—no difficulty attended their collection. I trust the American people value and respect their Government as much as the people of any State can their State Government; and I argue, therefore, that the whole, for the purposes of the whole, will furnish money with as much alacrity as do a part for the purposes of a part.

But, says the honorable member, this is the proper season to dismiss the army, for should it not be done until peace is made with France, it never will be done; amity with France will beget hostility with Great Britain. This is possible, but I hope not probable. Was it so, it certainly furnishes a strong argument against the resolution. We should want the army to repel British aggression. It is to us of no importance, as to the principle, what nation becomes our foe. All I wish is, to avoid cause of war with any; this done, it is enough for us to know that America has an enemy: its name or color will not change my fixed resolve, which is to defend my country against any and every enemy, by true and adequate preparations. The honorable member contends that the twelve regiments form no part of the original system of defence, and therefore may be dismissed without breaking at all on that system. He himself voted for the twelve regiments, and never considered them as a feature in the system we wish to hold inviolate. Yet the same gentleman tells us that the provisional army did form a part of the defensive system but being believed by himself and others to be unconstitutional, they substituted in its place the twelve regiments. Certainly the thing substituted must be viewed as was the thing whose place it assumed: of course the twelve regiments are properly considered as part of the system of defence, and the honorable member by his own showing is bound to unite with us in holding safe this substituted additional force. Again, the proximity of St. Domingo to our Southern States, weak from their peculiar condition, had its effect in producing the law forming the twelve regiments. A treaty has since been made with St. Domingo; consequently this reason no longer operates.

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

I know nothing about the supposed treaty, but sure I am that no treaty we can make with St. Domingo can prevent France, in case of an invasion, from using that island as the place of rendezvous for the invading forces, as well as applying all the troops she may find there, white and black, in support of her views. The proximity then of St. Domingo is as operative now as it was at the time the gentleman alludes to.

Having noticed such points in the argument just delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I beg leave to occupy your time with some few observations on a part of the argument used by my honorable colleague who moved the resolution. He spoke in decided terms of our fiscal debility, and descanted largely upon this assumed data. He expressly said, if I understood him, that such was our impoverished condition, that want of money would soon compel the disbandment of the army. Was this the case, we are fitted only for colonization; our boasted independence is a mere illusion, and the blood and treasure expended in its attainment a wretched and useless sacrifice. Was the gentleman correct, not only ought his resolution obtain, but the pageantry of self government ought to be abandoned; this House ought to return to their homes and communicate the sad but true intelligence to our constituents, that they might look out for some protector, themselves being inadequate to that high end. Happily for us, happily for our fellow citizens, my worthy colleague is entirely mistaken. We are great, powerful, and free people, capable and ready to maintain our rights and to transmit them with all the expenses attending their defence to a grateful posterity; a posterity who, participating in the good derived from our toils and exertions, will cheerfully share in the evils accompanying the good, will pay their portion of loans, though borrowed at eight per cent., and even at a higher rate, if necessary.

If, Mr. Chairman, the resolution on the table could but meet the same unanimous vote as was displayed on a late occasion, the rejection would do away all the ills its production threatens. I lament deeply the existence of such a proposition; I wish it had rested alone in the breast of the honorable mover, but as it has been introduced, let us destroy it without delay; it holds up a spirit of dissension at a period when the best interests of the nation and its true policy alike inculcate the sacred duty of cherishing and confirming a spirit of union.

Mr. NICHOLAS, said, from the manner in which the subject had been treated by the gentlemen who opposed the motion, the question again recurred, as he conceived it would, and placed itself in the position first intended, which was, whether the army should now be disbanded, or whether it never should; for it was apparent that, if it was not now done, the ingenuity of gentlemen opposed to it would always, on the same arguments, be able to keep it from dismissal, unless there should be a perfect accommodation with France. Yesterday it was said, by the gentleman who opposed the motion, that the army might be so modified as to give a great saving of expense, and might even be disbanded if the failure of negotiation did not threaten new dangers; but to day such a riddance of it had been treated as fanatical, although suggested by the gentleman's honorable friend. What might be learned from this? Why, that whenever a motion should be made for disbanding this army, it must be considered whether there was a possibility of invasion or not. That might ever be apprehended, and yet never nearer or more probable than at the present moment.

The gentleman last up (Mr. LEE) had said much of what this country could do in case of necessity. To show the disposition and power to meet danger, he cited an act of the Legislature of Virginia, for the purchase of arms. At the time alluded to that State went farther than the gentleman thought necessary, although the measure was a proper one even for a time of profound peace. But what a country could do in times when it was apprehensive of invasion, or actually invaded, and what it should do when danger is only possible, were two questions, entirely different.

The gentleman last up, in order to aid the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, who preceded him, says, that in the event of a peace between France and England, the desire to direct the councils of this country might produce invasion. This admits the necessity of a peace between France and England before the measure would be practicable, and supposes that then France might pursue her system without restraint from Great Britain. The gentleman, by defining the danger, shows more forcibly than we could that there is none, for, besides postponing it to a most uncertain event, he makes it depend on what is impossible, that England should be a calm spectator of the contest. I do not believe our safety depends on either, and have only said so much to show that there is no necessity to guard against invasion according to the gentleman's own showing.

It was said, by the gentleman from Delaware, that France could have no other view than invasion if she broke up the negotiation. If this was the only ground on which the gentleman's probability of invasion could take place, it certainly was very unstable, and yet he adduced no other. This was well answered, that negotiation had failed, and yet no invasion had taken place, nor an effort made to that purpose. When nations quarrel it does not follow that views of conquest are entertained. Very few wars end in an acquisition of territory, much less in the subjugation of either party, and if advantages are at last gained, it is because the money resources of one or other are exhausted.

Do we not run the risk of bringing ourselves, by untimely and unnecessary exertions, to a situation where submission to dishonorable terms may be necessary? Are we not in danger of doing the work of our enemy, by making so imprudent and useless an effort? We shall find, by attending to the contest now going on, that both parties have expected its termination from the poverty of the other. The British Minister said, that as France had no regular financial system she must soon fail. On the other hand, France supposes that the power of Great Britain to borrow money must be limited, and that she could support her credit no longer. These expectations were so well founded on both sides, that in all probability they have spun out the war to its present length. Let us not place ourselves in a situation where we may be expected to submit, from the difficulty of maintaining it.

The gentleman says it will have an unfavorable effect on our Commissioners in France. What possible effect can it have? This must depend on the first consideration, that is, the danger of invasion. If no danger is to be apprehended in time of war, if no employment is likely to be given to the army, they surely cannot influence the negotiation. If the measures of resistance here have influenced the conduct of France, as gentlemen assert, it must be those measures which deprive them of some benefits they derived from this country. So far from proving, by the measure now proposed, that our determination to resist is weakened, it must prove the reverse; as it will be a confirmation of that part of the system which can alone have touched them, and will give us ability, if we choose, to enlarge it. So far from not showing a determination to defend ourselves at home it gives a defiance to that country, with the natural strength of our country, the militia, and shows that we are not dependent on this pitiful army. It is this language I wish the resolution should speak, and nothing but a perversion of terms can extort any other from it. The gentleman says the navy is his favorite object. Again, sir, I say that we can preserve this object and dismiss the other, which we are not able to bear without unnecessary burdens; and the gentleman supports all the inference I make from parting with the army while other measures are supported, when he confesses that the army is the least important. Will it not have a worse effect on our Commissioners to know that we sent them away under appearances of great military strength, which they know we are unable to keep up? The consequence will be a supposition that we have now stretched every nerve, and must soon relax. But take the measure proposed, and you will say "we have shown our determination of defence as far as danger showed itself; what is no longer necessary we disband." This, I believe, is the true effect of it.

The gentleman, in the outset, disclaimed any regard to popular feelings on the subject. I know not what the general opinion is, and therefore cannot be suspected of conforming to it; I know that in my part of the country the people are determined to bear all the expense that is necessary, but I hope that they require us to give up all unnecessary expenses and to spend their money only on useful objects. I do believe that nothing but a determination in the people to prevent all expenses which do not appear to be absolutely necessary, will prevent the lavishing of public money upon useless objects, or even preserve a Republican Government among us. I am sure that nothing but a principle of economy will secure to us the happiness we enjoy.

All the gentlemen who had been up, Mr. N. said, had stated his opinion to be that it was impossible for the country to bear the expense. Perhaps, he said, he had stated it in too strong terms; if it were conceived to mean that it was impossible for this country in any event to bear the expense, he would declare he meant no such thing. He knew the country would bear very much in case of invasion. For himself, he would go the full length in patriotism with any gentleman in the House on such an event. My opinion was and is now, said Mr. N., that the expense is greater than can be borne with propriety; that its continuance now is unnecessary, and would deprive us of means which would be more properly retained until the danger was in prospect. It is the uselessness and misapplication of the expense I meant, and that ground I still maintain.

The gentleman from Delaware stated that the resolution could only be founded on a confidence in the disposition of the French towards this country in the negotiation. I disclaim any impressions of this kind; I know of no such thing. On the contrary I act on a supposition of the possible failure of that negotiation. I repeat, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that if I was certain of the good success of that measure I should not think it worth agitating the House for; I would now withdraw it if I could ascertain that fact. But I press it upon the Committee because, in case of the failure of the negotiation, the increase of passion on this floor would be so great that, though the expense might be equally useless, it would be impossible to retrench our expenses. It is impossible for me to adopt the opinion of the gentleman from Delaware, and say that we invite them to invasion by disbanding our troops. We do not leave the country defenceless; he cannot believe any such thing, because the contrary is apparent. We only want the expense taken from an object where it is useless, and where it has done no good, and if necessary, place it on another, which we will agree deserves a preference to the army. Let gentlemen say what they will on our state of security, they must still acknowledge that our principal defence against invasion from France, or any other Power, is in our own natural means, the people. This cannot be questioned. We have large claims on France for depredations committed on us; we know not the result of our demand. France may refuse us peace, from an unwillingness to make compensation. If her animosity should still continue against this country, it is not likely that it would ever show itself in any way but that hitherto practised—invasion is not to be apprehended.

The only specious argument which has been used is the trifling expense of these troops for two or three months. For this time I could bear the expense willingly; but, sir, it is the expense for two or three years that this Committee is called to vote upon, for the reasons already given. It is the system of borrowing money to pay these troops, which we deprecate. This system of borrowing money to pay the interest of money borrowed before (which must soon be the case) will inevitably hurry us to ruin and bankruptcy. Unless, therefore, we can with propriety lay new taxes on our people, it is a duty we owe to our constituents to stop this among other unnecessary expenses.

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) supposes the French Government will think that we are either too poor to bear the expense, that we are foolishly versatile, or that there is a party in our country to support their views. I wish the gentleman would prove that the rejection of the resolution would not have the effect to prove our foolishness in continuing a great needless expense. Sir, is a nation never to alter its course? Is it never to determine whether it has done right or wrong, and change its system? Is it to persevere in doing the very work of its enemy, and never to retrench an expense, though ever so extravagant? This is the way I would wish to see the question explained, and on this we are called to vote.

The next impression contemplated was that we are too poor to continue our defensive system. How can this be, since it divulges nothing new? What better publication can be made than the advertisements of the Treasury Department to borrow five millions upon a revenue of nine? Is not this notorious? It would be folly to expect any operation from the use of a fact already well known. The third effect the gentleman conceived it would have, was, to give the belief that a party favorable to French views were in this country. I did suppose that this topic was exhausted, and that we should hear no more on that head, of which we have heard so much. This subject is so completely exhausted that I do not believe there are any ears to receive it. But I would beg the gentleman to inform us how, if there was danger under this circumstance, they would recommend the House to act? Why, I suppose give up all their opinions to them, and sacrifice all their views for the good of the country, to prevent France acting under such a deception. The consequence of this is evidently to keep down the freedom of opinion, and to destroy the usefulness of every member who is afraid of being called by the gentleman a French partisan. I am not afraid of this impression, and therefore, as I think the motion right, it is not the clamors of that side of the House, nor their imaginary dangers, that will prevent me acting up to my duty.

The gentleman from Delaware concludes by supposing that France would establish this very measure if she had superintendence over our councils. This would lead us back again to inquire into the danger of invasion, and the propriety of keeping up a standing army for an event which nobody says is more than possible. I am sure there is no apprehension of invasion in a great majority of the members of this House. If the question was now agitated whether this army should be raised, if it was not now in existence, there would be two-thirds of the members of the House against it, because they would conceive it unnecessary. I would appeal to the reason of gentlemen whether the same opinion must not now strike them, and with some force, in favor of disbanding this useless army. If there is no danger of invasion, in the opinion of the Committee, they must vote in favor of the motion.

Mr. MACON.—Finding that the Committee are determined to have the question, and that the only thing that a minority can do is to speak, he should give his sentiments on the subject. The question is intimately connected with our state of finance, and it would not be improper to consider it in that view. In the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE) and some others, the borrowing of five or six millions was a trifling thing, we might leave it for our children to pay. This is unjust; if we contract a debt, we ought to pay it, and not leave it to our children. The actions of Government are often compared to those of an individual; and what should we think of a father, who would run in debt, and leave it to his children to pay? But the want of money is not to be regarded. To be sure it is much easier to vote money, than to lay taxes, because the people do not directly feel the vote, but if taxed they must instantly know it; therefore loaning is the way mostly practised. But the time is now come when we begin to feel that our revenue from imports and tonnage is not so great as it was last year. One reason for this is the low price of produce. The value of the exports must in some measure regulate the imports; and the great decrease in value of our produce in Europe, must make the capital employed less. When gentlemen say that the American people will put everything at stake, and make great sacrifices to support their independence, I agree with them; but this is not at stake, and you must convince them, that the expense is necessary. However willing they may be to pay their taxes, their ability can only be in proportion to the price of their produce, and as produce is now at a low price, it will be difficult for many of them to pay.

Notwithstanding the great increase of capital which the gentleman told us of, from eighteen to fifty millions, yet we have been obliged with all this increase to borrow money, and now are told we want somewhere about five millions more this year. We were told that the people are fond of economy, this is true, and I have no doubt they will willingly pay all the taxes that we can convince them are necessary; but ought we not to save all the expenses which are not absolutely necessary, especially when we have a very important money concern to settle with another powerful nation, with whom you may have a great demand; and, if you do, where is the money to satisfy it? I suppose the gentlemen will say another loan; but where is the interest to come from? We cannot make money here by any means but work; labor is our only resource; therefore our money concerns ought to be well husbanded.

Mr. M. said if he could have heard any proof of the argument of gentlemen, or that any good purpose could be obtained by keeping the army, he should have been silent on the subject; but this had not been proved. To calculate any effect that these troops might produce on a distant enemy, was wrong; because nations would calculate the strength and resources of nations, and not on any small army. Could it be supposed that any nation would conceive that because we had but twelve or fifteen thousand men in arms, that we had no more than that number, or could raise no more? No, it could not.

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

If the British, during the war, had conceived that our regular army was all the strength of the country, they would not, perhaps, have so soon given up the contest. We were then obliged to bring our forces to every place of danger; and if any nation should invade our country, we should have again to repel the enemy in the same way. It is most prudent now to save all the money we possibly can, while the danger of an invasion cannot be apprehended, in order to enable us with more ease to meet the enemy; for, if we get ourselves poor while the enemy is at a distance, we shall be obliged to resort to enormous taxes if he should really come to our doors.

[Mr. CHRISTIE, observing the members in general engaged in private conversation, and not only inattentive themselves but preventing other gentlemen hearing, expressed his opinion of their ill behaviour. On the Chairman obtaining order, Mr. MACON proceeded.]

Mr. M. disregarded such conduct, for, said he, we have two privileges, one to speak, the other not to hear; it did not disturb him. The principal dependence, he said, must be in the militia, notwithstanding the little confidence some gentlemen appear to have in them. He did not wish nor intend to take the least honor from the valiant men who were engaged in the brilliant action of the Eutaws, but he could not forget the unrivalled valor of our citizens at the battle of King's Mountain, where there was not a single regular engaged, but men who left their homes on the spur of the moment, and conquered regular troops, which were commanded by an able and experienced officer, so that none escaped either death or capture.

The burden of the expense of regular troops, as well as all other expenses of the Government, Mr. M. said, fell heaviest on the laboring poor. The rich would not feel the weight of taxes, but the poor certainly would. When money came into the Treasury it would not be useful to employ it to support this army. Money is the very sinew of war; if, therefore, we use it unnecessarily in time of peace, it must be wanted if war should ever come. No gentleman could say, that the money spent in supporting this army would be for any serviceable purpose, except it might be so considered just about the cantonments of the troops, where the money will be scattered, and thereby enable the neighborhood to pay their taxes more easily; but, in a general view, it must be considered as wasted. If he had not heard gentlemen of such profound talents speak as to its usefulness, Mr. M. said, he should have thought that no man considered the army of any service whatever.

It had been said that it would be difficult to get another army if it should be wanted some time hence, and you now disband this. The very contrary appeared to Mr. M. to be the fact, for the very same men would enlist again for the bounty, pay, and clothes, and expect to be again discharged in a few months; and this might also induce others to enlist. But, whenever an army is really wanted, the patriotism of the people will always supply the emergency.

Gentlemen calculated on another loan, but were they certain that we could make another, even at eight per cent., or at any rate? Might not the present state of the commercial world, so replete with large failures, prevent the possibility of one; and suppose the army should be kept up, on the presumption that one will be made, and, when you make the attempt, that you fail, would not the event be disastrous, and what would become of our credit then? It is possible that the derangement of trade in Europe might prevent the possibility of a loan being made there, and whatever might be the patriotism of the people, in such times, they would be obliged to take care at home, and make good their own contracts, before they could venture to lend money to the Government; perhaps our moneyed men would think it imprudent to part with their cash, before they knew the result of these failures.

The gentleman from Virginia certainly furnished an argument against himself when he mentioned the importance of America, in the two wars to which he alluded. It could not be supposed for a moment, that France, if she wished the friendship of this country, would invade it, unless she expected conquest; which would be an illusive idea; indeed she could not suppose any chance for conquest. The fate of an invading enemy marching through the country last war, would undoubtedly be a sufficient warning to any nation not to make the attempt, for if it did, the consequence would be the same, it would be cut off and their vain attempts rendered fruitless.

The gentleman from Delaware asked whether you would send out men not disciplined, nor organized, and without even arms, against men learned in military tactics. Mr. M. said it appeared to him very different from that representation; the knowledge of the use of a gun was universal; he had never seen an American who could not shoot, and that was the principal use of a gun. So much had they a natural kind of practice over Europeans in general. There could not be a doubt but if the young men were got together they would be soldiers immediately, for, understanding the use of arms, they would easily be disciplined. As, therefore, he apprehended no danger, and if there was danger an easy remedy could be applied; and, as it was more proper to save money than to waste it on a useless object, he should vote in favor of the motion.

When Mr. MACON sat down, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request in one of the resolutions of Congress, of the twenty-first of December last I transmitted a copy of those resolutions, by my Secretary, Mr. Shaw, to Mrs. Washington, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character; of their condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence; and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, in the manner expressed in the first resolution. As the sentiments of that virtuous lady, not less beloved by this nation than she is at present greatly afflicted, can never be so well expressed as in her own words, I transmit to Congress her original letter.

It would be an attempt of too much delicacy to make any comments upon it; but, there can be no doubt that the nation at large, as well as all the branches of the Government, will be highly gratified by any arrangement which may diminish the sacrifice she makes of her individual feelings.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1800.

The letter referred to in the said Message is as follows:

"MOUNT VERNON, December 31, 1799.

SIR: While I feel, with keenest anguish, the late dispensation of Divine Providence, I cannot be insensible to the mournful tributes of respect and veneration which are paid to the memory of my dear deceased husband; and, as his best services and most anxious wishes were always devoted to the welfare and happiness of his country, to know that they were truly appreciated and gratefully remembered affords no inconsiderable consolation.

Taught, by that great example which I have so long had before me, never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by Congress, which you have had the goodness to transmit to me; and, in doing this, I need not, I cannot, say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

With grateful acknowledgments and unfeigned thanks for the personal respect and evidences of condolence expressed by Congress and yourself, I remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

MARTHA WASHINGTON."

The said Message, and letter accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to be referred to the joint committee appointed the nineteenth ultimo, on receipt of the intelligence of the death of General GEORGE WASHINGTON, to prepare and report measures suitable to the occasion.

THURSDAY, January 9.

A petition of Nathaniel Whitaker, of the town of Bath, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be allowed to receive a reasonable part of the proceeds from the sale of a certain vessel engaged in the slave trade, in consideration of the exertions which he made and expenses he incurred in procuring her condemnation, in consequence of a breach of the act, entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country."

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with his opinion thereupon, to the House.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the motion for a repeal of certain parts of the acts relative to the Army, passed the sixteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that when the member from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) rose yesterday, he informed the Committee that he was not surprised at the introduction of this resolution; he believed it to be a part of a system which for several years had existed, the object of which was to debilitate and degrade the Government of this country; and, believing it to be a part of that system, he was not surprised at the quarter from which it came. When gentlemen undertook to criminate the motives of others, Mr. N. said, it would be well if they would offer some evidence of the purity of their own; and he trusted that the gentleman from Delaware would find considerable difficulty in convincing not only this Committee, but the public at large, that his motives were more pure and patriotic than those of other members who differed with him in opinion.

It must be recollected, Mr. N. said, that when the mover of this resolution called it up for the consideration of the House, he expressed a wish that it might be discussed with temper and moderation, and that the acrimony which had existed too much in former sessions might not make its appearance on the present. The resolution was not proposed for the purpose of inflaming the House, but merely to correct an undue and useless expense. An expression of this wish, Mr. N. said, he did hope would have protected the friends of the resolution from those general imputations which the member from Delaware had thrown out against them; but, instead of a cool and temperate discussion, instead of a calm and dispassionate train of reasoning, the gentleman had indulged himself in a furious invective against his opponents, which might have been more rationally expected from a member of that rapacious and fanatical Government which the honorable member had described as existing beyond the Atlantic, and against which a principal part of his execrations were directed. As I disapprove of this conduct in the gentleman, said Mr. N., I shall endeavor to pursue a different line. While I deliver my opinions, I trust I shall not cease to respect the opinions of others. I am willing to believe that although other gentlemen may pursue a different road from me, yet that they are actuated by motives equally patriotic; that they are using their exertions for the attainment of the same end, although they might think other means the most likely to accomplish it; and that all have in view the same objects—the honor and welfare, the happiness and prosperity of the country.

Nor, Mr. N. said, did he think it necessary to pursue the gentleman through his historical windings relative to the different negotiations which had been attempted with the French Directory, because he did not think that any argument, either for or against the adoption of the resolution, could be drawn from that source. He was willing to admit that the conduct of France towards this country had excited one general sentiment of indignation against them in the people of America, and had produced a unanimous zeal for the maintenance of American honor and independence. But what did that prove? Nothing more than that the people were willing to expend their money in support of their rights; but surely it did not go to prove that they were willing to throw away their money in support of an object of useless expense—an army which could not be brought to act against their enemies. If the gentleman had gone on a little farther in the history of this business, he might have shown that of late the French had acted a different part, and were now offering us that “olive branch” which in a moment of frenzy they had trodden under foot. The President of the United States had wisely embraced their offers of accommodation, and had sent Envoys for the purpose of treating with them, which step he believed met with general approbation, with an allowance for a few exceptions only.

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1800.

The member from Virginia, (Mr. MARSHALL,) who first rose in opposition to this resolution, had taken a position which Mr. N. said he thought had been fully remarked on by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN;) but he discovered in the subsequent part of the debate yesterday, that it had produced a powerful effect on the minds of some members, particularly on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HARTLEY.) The position which I refer to, said Mr. N., is, that a middle ground might be taken, and the system might be supported at a less expense. By this, sir, I presume that it was meant that the number of the twelve regiments might be reduced, or that the enlistments might be stopped; an idea which I have heard thrown out by some. This argument or position, whatever it might be called, Mr. N. said, would prove more perhaps than gentlemen were aware of.

He presumed that when the law passed for raising these troops, it was not in the idea of any gentleman to employ them out of the limits of these States; that they were only to be employed to repel an invading enemy, or to check their progress after a landing had been effected. If one or both of these were the objects, it would be well to inquire whether these 10,000 men, if already raised, would be equal to the task allotted to them. He imagined that no gentleman would contend that they were. If at this moment intelligence should be received that there was a French fleet on the coast, with French troops on board, could the Executive of our Government determine on that point of the coast at which our force should concentrate? Surely not. They must rely upon the native strength of the country, the militia of that part against which the attack would be directed, and these troops might afterwards come in to support them. If the French Government was to send an army here it would be an efficient one, calculated to act with vigor, and to do very extensive mischief; it would not be such a one as could be checked by a small force, only 10,000 strong.

From this view of the subject it must be conceded, —and indeed the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE) had conceded the point—that these forces would not be sufficient either to repel an invading enemy, or to check it after the invasion was complete. And yet gentleman argue for the necessity of keeping up some force to repel an invasion, when at the same time they will agree to reduce a force which they acknowledge is already incompetent for the purposes which they themselves wish to keep them for. With what face can gentlemen declare that they are apprehensive of an invasion, when in the same breath they also declare their willingness to reduce a force which they acknowledge is too small to repel an invasion? Can it be possible that they feel these apprehensions, and yet are willing to lessen their means of defence? Sir, said Mr. N., it would be more reasonable to suppose, if gentlemen really believe there is danger of an invasion from France, that they should be anxious to increase, and not diminish, our Military Establishment; but they affect to believe there is danger and yet say they will agree to reduce our strength. The circumstance of these gentlemen being willing to reduce the army must prove one of two things; either that they do not believe there is any danger of invasion, or, if they do believe it, they do not think the army is calculated to defend the country. In either case, therefore, by keeping it up, we incur unnecessary expense, by applying our resources to useless objects, and weaken our finances, without a prospect of deriving any benefit from the measure. If there is no danger of invasion we ought to disband the army, and if we are to continue at war with France, it will enable us to apply more money on such objects as can be brought to operate with more effect against her.

I cannot conceive, sir, said Mr. N., what possible inducements France could have to invade America; I can see no advantages which she could derive from an invasion. Let gentlemen look back to the situation of France at the commencement of her Revolution, and compare it with the present state of things. She then had colonies abroad; the East and West Indies acknowledged her empire; her finances were at least in as good a situation as at present; her enemies were neither so numerous nor so powerful; and yet the consequence has been that her colonies are sacrificed and there is not one of them that she can with any confidence look to, as forming a part of her dominions. Her territory at home has indeed been increased, but her foreign possessions are either conquered by her enemies or are in a state of independence. Can it be possible then that France would send a force across the Atlantic to attack a country which she could have no hope of retaining even if she could conquer it; or is it not more probable, if she had the force to spare, that she would employ it for the purpose of regaining her former possessions? The island of St. Domingo would be worth the trouble and expense of conquest, if it could be afterwards secured; but, sir, I am inclined to believe that the European Powers begin to doubt the policy of foreign dominions.

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. of R.

Two or three gentlemen who had opposed the motion, Mr. N. said, had drawn what they supposed to be strong arguments, in their favor, from the relative situation of America in the wars of '56 and '76. He took a concise view of the contending Powers in the war of '56, and stated that France, Austria, Russia and Sweden, were arranged in battle against Prussia and England, with her dependencies; America was of course in the scale of Britain. After a war of seven years, in which much blood was shed and much treasure expended, the Treaty of Paris was concluded, which though said by some malcontents in England not to be so favorable to Britain as she had a right to expect, yet, considering that the war commenced in America between the French and English colonies about their respective rights, may fairly be called an advantageous treaty to England, as she had considerable cessions made her on the continent of America. In the war of '76 America took a different position, and was arranged on the side of France. The events of the war, he said, were too well known to require any statement from him, and Britain was crippled not only in her finances, but very much injured in her foreign possessions. All this he was willing to admit arose from the importance of America being thrown into the scale of one or other of the contending Powers. What, Mr. N. asked, are the respective situations of France and Great Britain at the present day? France is contending almost against the whole world; her power and that of Britain are equally balanced; the one victorious by land, the other by sea. If, then, America is thus all important to these rival nations, and her acquisition to either would gain a preponderance to the scale, would it not be the height of madness in France to attempt an invasion of America, when such an act must be attended with the necessary consequence of uniting America to Britain in the contest, of throwing us into the arms of the enemies to France; or, in the language of gentlemen, would not America by this measure be thrown into the scale of Great Britain; and, reasoning from analogy, would not France be subject to disasters similar to those produced by the war of 1756? There could be no doubt that America, would take up arms against France in the event of an invasion, unless indeed, as had been insinuated, there should be a party here strong enough to lay our independence under foot.

The gentleman from Delaware had asked if France had not men enough and ships enough for the purposes of invasion? Mr. N. said he acknowledged France was very populous, that her inhabitants were vastly numerous in her own country, and the acquisition of Belgium made them much more so. It might at the first view be supposed that they had men to spare, but what had been their situation the last campaign? They were not in want of able generals; they were not in want of ammunition or anything else but men, and therefore the consequence was disastrous to her until the latter part of the campaign, when her conscripts went out, and then from her sufficiency of men she conquered. From this it must appear that she has no men to spare, nor had she, a short time past, enough for her own service. Has she not ships enough? was the next question. She has to be sure her own fleet, and that of Spain in Brest harbor, but does she not want these fleets for other purposes? She requires all she can procure to be a check upon the enormous fleets of Great Britain. There can be no doubt, but that the same wisdom and policy which have hitherto guided the affairs of France, will induce her to keep her fleets at home until opportunity should offer to execute a project which she has never professed to abandon—the invasion of Ireland.

If France ever should have views of invading America, this is the most unlikely of any period whatever. She has at home as much as she can do, and it is very unlikely that she will send a large army and fleet 3,000 miles on an expedition which at best is uncertain, and if its success was certain, her means to protect her acquisition must inevitably fail. If there ever will be such an idea, it will be at a moment of peace, when all Europe are in quiet, and America in no state of preparation against an invasion. But I trust this event will never take place, even in that state of Europe. But how far would this state of alarm carry us? Certainly farther than any gentleman would wish. We should not only now be in a state of preparation, but ever hereafter. If invasion was always to be apprehended, (which it must be, on the same arguments which gentlemen now use,) we must always be ready to meet it, and the continuation of this army is defensible upon the same principles. Our preparation must continue in proportion to our European connexions, because we shall always be proportionably engaged in European contests. We never can form a new connexion with any Power but we shall be more or less engaged in her quarrels. But since we are in this situation, we must abide by the consequences. If then it is necessary to keep up the army at this time, can we look forward to any future time in which we can safely part with it? I can see no moment, said Mr. N., when we shall not be in equal danger, and if in equal danger equal preparation will be contended for. We must, therefore, at all times, whether in peace or war, keep up the armament to repel invasion, not only from France, but every other Power in Europe, and then we shall be compelled to admit the dangerous doctrine of keeping up a standing army in time of peace.

It was said by some gentlemen, that the provision for raising these 10,000 men had already produced a good effect upon France, in changing her conduct towards us. It had been truly stated by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) that the law for raising these troops passed in July '98, and that the overtures for negotiation on the part of France were made in the ensuing August; so that this was no argument. But, independent of this fact, let me beg gentlemen to look back on the conduct of France. At what period has she been alarmed? When has she shrunk from a contest with her enemies? Have preparations of war in other countries produced conciliatory propositions on the part of France; or has not her spirit always roused into action in proportion to the martial disposition of her neighbors? Take a view, said Mr. N., of the immense combinations lately formed against her—did they alarm her? Has she not supported herself against a world in arms; and has she not always been more terrible in proportion to the numbers she has had to contend with? Call to mind the preparations made against her by Great Britain in the year 1792; did France then shrink from the contest? No, sir, on the contrary, she anticipated the intentions of Great Britain, and, instead of waiting for acts of hostility against herself, declared war on her own part, in February, 1793, against the most powerful nation in the world. Can it be supposed then that France would be alarmed at our small force of 10,000 men only, at the distance, too, of 3,000 miles across the Atlantic—when we had not the means of transporting them to a situation where they could act against her—when she was not alarmed at preparations infinitely more extensive forming even on her own borders? Surely not, sir; and to this we cannot attribute the pacific disposition of France.

The argument of the gentleman from Delaware, that this measure would be dictated by the Directory, if they could govern our councils, he thought equally unapt with several others. If, Mr. N. said, the Directory wished to weaken the country, and could guide our councils, they would advise not only a continuance of the army, but the raising of more troops. They would advise us to expend our money upon useless objects, thereby to cripple our finances as much as possible, and then indeed we might be an easy prey, when the people were so loaded with taxes and debts that they were indifferent as to what Government they lived under. On the other hand, the wise step they thought would be to husband our resources, to let our people live easy and happy, to attach them to the Government; to make no new loans, to impose no new taxes, and then we should always be prepared for war when either the honor or interest of the country required it.

Upon the whole, Mr. N. said, in every view he could give this subject, it appeared to him that by keeping up this army we incurred a useless expense, which the country ought to get clear of as soon as possible; and more particularly so, when money is wanted for other purposes. If, said he, I could believe that we were in danger from any foreign Power whatever; if for a moment I could suppose that France meditated an attack upon our independence, I would go as far in the expenditure both of public and private property as any gentleman in this House; I would join heart and hand in raising forces and equipping fleets. With the gentleman from Delaware, I should be ready to exclaim, "millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute!" Not believing so, I shall give my hearty assent to the resolution.

Mr. SHEPARD said, he did not rise with a view of lengthening the debate, nor did he intend to follow the gentlemen who favored the resolution, but he could not avoid being struck with one position they had taken with respect to the expense: he therefore should make a few observations on what had fallen from them on that subject. The gentlemen had taken exceedingly broad ground in the defence of the resolution, and had advanced many strange positions, but that respecting our finances was the most extraordinary—that the United States were in such a situation as to be unable to support the small army contemplated! He thought this could not require an answer; he therefore should proceed to another argument which has been used, which was, that the army was not wanted, for the militia were a competent defence in case of invasion, or whatever could take place. This had been so ably spoken to, that he did not flatter himself to think he could add anything thereto, but he should make an observation or two.

It had been said that the expense was useless, and if an army should be necessary at any time it could be raised. But did gentlemen consider the expense of raising men? Each of these 3,500 men had received at least twelve dollars bounty; to disband them would be to lose that money entirely, besides discipline and clothing. Should it be necessary to raise another army a short time hence, the whole of that money must be again provided. Mr. S. said he would place as much dependence as any gentleman within those walls on the valor of the militia, and would pay them every respect due to their services, but, if he could possibly call gentlemen's attention to realize the situation of Massachusetts in 1775, when attacked by the English, he thought they would not conceive their services against a well disciplined army to be so great. Few gentlemen ever witnessed such a scene of consternation and general distress as pervaded the whole country. Murder, plunder, and general devastation, were spread through the country. Every man who possessed arms was called out, but though their number was great, yet, having no general officer to lead them, vast numbers of lives were thrown away, and only for the want of a few well disciplined troops for them to rally round, and lead the army.

Very material advantages, Mr. S. thought, would arise from a continuation of the army at this time. Our very independence is concerned. And shall we value five millions of dollars at as high a rate as our independence? He trusted not. In addition to that inestimable blessing, it is possible that the lives of many brave men and officers may be thrown away for want of expending a little money; for very little would be necessary to keep these men for a few months. Let us pursue the path we have taken and keep our defensive system in the same situation, if we wish for an honorable peace. Hold fast that which is good, and I believe we shall be saved. But if, on the other hand, we recede from these measures, when they are wanted we shall not have them, and, for want of well applied strength, numbers may perish who would otherwise have lived. If, therefore, we study humanity, or policy, or prosperity and peace, let us, with a noble unanimity, reject the motion, which will make a good impression of our strength on our enemies.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said, that if the gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. SHEPARD) thought there would be a unanimous vote, he must rely very much on the force of what he had advanced, for he certainly had the best proofs to the contrary. He said it had been observed that those gentlemen who were in favor of the general system of defence, ought to vote for a continuation of the army as a part of it; he did not think so, because gentlemen who then viewed the measure as necessary, might now see such a change in affairs as to make them alter their opinions. However, he would say, were he one of those in favor of that system, he saw nothing which would induce him to alter his opinion, for he saw no necessity at that time to warrant raising this army, nor at this time to keep it up.

By attending to the arguments of gentlemen opposed to the resolutions on your table, it would appear, that it went to the destruction of the whole system of defence. It could not be viewed in that light by an impartial mind. If it were so, Mr. W. said, he should hesitate before he voted in favor of it: the resolution, he said, applied to that system, was only to make a deduction of the variation in it; trifling as it related to system, but important in itself. Would gentlemen pretend to say that no change in public measures ought to be made? If so, the House ought to be careful how they proceeded. In order to properly appreciate the arguments against the resolution, it might not be amiss to take notice of the arguments which were made use of to carry this law in the House when it was passed. Invasion was then the cry, but near two years had elapsed and no invasion had been attempted, nor, he believed, thought of.

Internal disturbances were likewise apprehended, but no such thing had appeared, worth notice; but it was necessary to keep up the alarm. After a former negotiation with France had failed to accommodate differences, invasion was supposed to be the intention of France. These steps were therefore taken to guard against it. No invading foe has been heard of. A negotiation is now again set on foot, the same alarm is spread, but we are not to believe those gentlemen's apprehensions are well founded; therefore we will not trust to them; they have failed once, they may fail again. We have the benefit of experience for our guide, which teaches the apprehensions of an invasion to be ill-founded. The only argument urged by those who opposed the resolution, which had any weight with me, said Mr. W.—and I declare I have given the subject all the consideration in my power—was the possibility of this measure having an influence on the negotiation now pending with France; and, inasmuch as I cannot, on mature reflection, think that it would have any effect of that kind, I cannot think it necessary to keep up the army, and therefore shall vote for the resolution.

How is it probable that it could affect or injure the pending negotiation with France? Sir, I think it would have a very contrary tendency. It appears to me it would rather promote the negotiation.

It would rather put it in the power of our Envoys to say to the French Government, "You see what our Government is determined to do; when you will not give us an audience, and continue hostile, they are determined to defend; but when you show a contrary disposition they immediately relax, and are disposed to meet you." This appears to me to be the language of reason. Farther, it would prove that on an emergency, or when we chose, we could get an army, but when that necessity is over, we can say to them "return to your homes and employments, we can do without you." This, and not an unfavorable impression, it would have, if any.

But it is stated an influence would be wrought another way, that it would show to that Government that we are not able to keep up an army; that our resources are inadequate to our wants, on account of which we are obliged to disband the troops. How, Mr. Chairman, can such an inference, with propriety, be drawn? Because I do not choose to go in debt, though I am able, shall it be said I am not able? As with an individual so with a nation. We choose not to borrow money; will France therefore say we cannot? They will draw no such conclusions. No, they will rather admire our prudence in avoiding unnecessary expense, and say, here is a nation temperate in its operations, firm in its principles, and rich in its resources, and not to be driven into ruinous measures by the threats of any nation.

But it is said that this army must be kept up for what may happen. I ask whether the same argument may not always hold good, with respect to any nation, between whom and us there may be but little friendship. When is the moment in which we might not be exposed to this danger? This argument will always apply to keep up a standing force in this country, greater than we ought to bear. When gentlemen use these arguments, I take it for granted this is the force they mean to keep upon a permanent establishment, whatever name they may give it; for I can see no bounds to an argument of the kind, or line at which we are to stop; it goes, sir, too far to answer the purpose intended.

We are asked, sir, whether we have forgotten the insult offered to our national dignity by France? We are asked, too, by the honorable member (Mr. MARSHALL) who from his situation must have felt the indignity more sensibly than any other member of this committee. But I hope no gentleman will be disposed to resent an insult offered farther than the interest and policy of the United States calls for. For, however much I might be disposed to individually resent an insult, the effects of which could only attach to myself, yet it is a very different thing when it is to affect the lives and happiness of thousands as well as a whole nation. And, sir, although I hope the insults offered our nation in our Commissioners, by the French Government, will never be forgotten, I cannot agree to carry my resentment so far as to keep up such extraordinary expenses and systems when there is no real danger.

But we are told, by the honorable member from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) that this resolution is the first step to a system which has been long and uniformly pursued by a certain party in this House, to debilitate the Government in all its systems of defence, and there will be an attempt to renew treaties and revive commerce. Sir, are these the things that are to make us shudder? Is it so disagreeable to renew friendship, commerce, and treaties, with any nation whatever, that we are called upon to dread it? I am ready to acknowledge that no argument I have heard, would sooner make me adopt the resolution, or any other which might produce all these much to be lamented facts, by that gentleman. I must confess if they have a terrific appearance to him, they have not to me. This same gentleman says, there is a party who wish to infuse into the minds of the people an opinion, that there is another party who wish to establish monarchy in this country. Sir, I believe, if an opinion of that kind has been entertained, it has been founded on the tendency of such measures as have been taken, and which have led other countries into that evil, for it is proper to calculate that similar causes will produce similar effects. If blame can rest upon such an opinion I am willing to take my part of it. But that men should not be permitted to differ in opinions, and that they cannot speak of certain measures, as tending to certain objects, without being charged as a party with implicating the conduct of those who differ from them, is strange.

The conduct of the militia in the last war with Great Britain and the spirit of '76 have been called up. Mr. Chairman, what has the spirit of '76 to do with the present question? How dissimilar our situation! Are we engaged in a Continental war? Is the enemy in our land, burning and destroying our towns, and scattering our villages? That is not our situation at present. Gentlemen say we could then have an army, but it is not the case now. I believe if our situation was one tenth as bad now, as then, we would soon have an army; and no member on this floor would think ten times the sum called for mispent, for a prize so valuable as our independence. I agree with gentlemen fully in the principle, but not in the application. If our independence was at stake, the money it would require for our security ought only to be a secondary consideration.

We ought to calculate upon expense in proportion to the object in view. If we are ever invaded we must defend our country, and the money it may cost must be out of the question; because, if we lose our country we lose our all, and nothing can come in competition. I do not therefore judge of this measure entirely on the score of expense, but that of its utility. It is said by the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. LEE) that America, with half the ability, supported a much larger force in her revolutionary war for her protection. She did so—she afforded all that was necessary for the object, and would do it again. But God forbid there ever should be another army in this country, equally useful, and paid off in the same manner, at the rate of two and three shillings in the pound? This, sir, is the way that army was paid. Sir, I hope we have men enough who would view their independence and liberties as sufficient compensation for them to repel any invasion; these are considerations that would call forth the patriotism of numbers whom money would not. But our present situation calls for no such sacrifices; we have no occasion for such noble exertions, or they would be made. It is not unworthy of notice that whatever measures are brought forward, their adoption and continuance are constantly urged by certain gentlemen, on some point of expediency or policy for the time present, notwithstanding any change in our affairs, and the true object and real state of things kept out of sight. But the time is fast approaching when it can no longer be done; our real situation must appear. Our Government has been regularly progressing in the accumulation of a public debt, at the same time that it is constantly imposing new taxes upon the people, and yet we are told not to mind the expense, we can borrow.

When the necessity of an expense is so far-fetched as gentlemen have been obliged to resort to in the present instance—no less nor more than bare apprehension and conjecture—it cannot be said that a motion to repeal such a useless expense is not properly made, and that the subject requires serious consideration. I wish to know for what these men are to be called forth. If it can appear necessary, the expense is unworthy of notice. I defy the proof of that necessity, and shall continue opposed unless convinced of their use. From every point of view, therefore, in which it can be made to appear, I continue in the opinion I first entertained; and seeing no necessity for the troops at this time, nor prospect of their future use, I consider them an useless expense, and shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, notwithstanding this question had occupied so much time in the discussion, he felt disposed to give the little aid in his power to a measure of whose wisdom he was firmly convinced, and in the success of which he knew his constituents to be deeply interested. He did not flatter himself with the hope of throwing much new light upon the subject, but he felt it to be his duty to deliver their sentiments upon it, and from that duty he trusted he should not shrink. Unaccustomed to public debate, the Committee would not be surprised at his inability to pursue the arguments of gentlemen through the intricate labyrinth in which they had been involved; yet, in such statements as he might make of them, he should endeavor to give them a fair interpretation, and not to twist them to a meaning which it was not intended they should bear.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MARSHALL,) who first rose in opposition to the resolution, has left this subject in a state in which I did not expect to find it when coming out of his hands. Sir, I entertain a respect as high as that of any member upon this floor for the talents of that gentleman; I have witnessed their exertion on a variety of occasions with singular delight; his ingenious researches and logical deductions have often commanded my admiration. Yet he will permit me to say that he has on this occasion advanced nothing which disproves the propriety of adopting the measure before you; and as he has been unable to produce any arguments of weight upon the subject, I shall take it for granted that none can be adduced. He has alleged nothing specific; his observations carry no conviction with them, they tend only to excite alarm and doubt. This is a situation in which that gentleman is not accustomed to leave the minds of his audience. He has affirmed that the adoption of the resolution of my colleague would have a deadly influence upon our pending negotiation with France. If, indeed, sir, I can be convinced that such will be its effect, I will give it a decided opposition. I would even go farther. If gentlemen would convince me that any addition to our military force would eventually secure an honorable issue to that negotiation, so highly do I value the restoration of that harmony which heretofore subsisted between the Republics; so completely in my opinion are the best interests of my country involved in a successful termination of the mission to that country, that I will even assent, reluctant as I am to such measures, to double our present establishment. But I must have some more substantial grounds of action than mere conjecture.

JANUARY, 1800.

But I oppose the establishment of a standing army in this country, not only as a useless and enormous expense, but upon the ground of the Constitution. The spirit of that instrument and the genius of a free people are equally hostile to this dangerous institution, which ought to be resorted to (if at all) only in extreme cases of difficulty and danger. Yet let it be remembered that usage, that immemorial custom, is paramount in every written obligation, and let us beware of ingrafting this abuse upon our Constitution. A people who mean to continue free must be prepared to meet danger in person; not to rely upon the fallacious protection of mercenary armies. The gentleman from Virginia spoke of a middle way to be adopted, which should reconcile all parties, but he has not specified anything. May I be permitted to name a measure which will completely protect us from every fear of danger, however remote? Meet the wishes of the people, bestow a part of the annual millions which are levied upon them, to the purpose of arming and organizing the militia. If ever a hostile nation should be rash enough to attempt an invasion of these States, it is upon the militia that we must rely for the defence of their own rights and everything that is dear to man. The word may be grating to the ears of some gentlemen, but, in that event, we must rely upon requisition. No country, unpossessed of the pecuniary resources of Britain, can afford (nor can she do it consistently with her public happiness) to keep up a mercenary army adequate to her defence. France, superior in resources to every country of the world but England, and second to her only in those of a pecuniary nature, has been obliged to abandon that system, and resort to requisitions of militia. Such a stress is however laid upon these twelve regiments by some, that our safety, nay, even our independence, it seems, hangs upon their existence. When gentlemen spoke of them as of such primary importance to our security from foreign invasion, I did expect that they would have proved their competency to the proposed object; that they would have satisfied us of the practicability of defending our extensive coast with an handful of men, not exceeding 4,000, scattered over the interior country; at least, that they would have shown that an invasion of this country by France was among probable events. I shall not attempt to answer arguments drawn from a supposed analogy between our country and Holland, Switzerland, &c., when no such analogy exists; nor do I think that the Administration of our Government have any reason to be obliged to the member from Delaware for suggesting that these troops may be necessary to overawe a hostile faction, who (like the oppressed subjects of the Batavian and Swiss aristocracies, anxious for any change, as being well assured that none would be more intolerable than their ancient servitude,) might be disposed to join the standard of an invading foe. Insinuations that these troops are to be used, on whatever pretext, against our own people, will not reconcile me to the measure. Gentlemen have called to mind our situation in 1775, and compared it with that of the present day. Where, sir, is the similitude? We were then weak, divided, destitute of resources, and of the power of calling into action such as we possessed; the enemy was in our bosom, his troops in possession of our important holds; the minds of men in a great degree unprepared for a bold assertion of reason and right, against the pretensions of law and power; our manly resistance branded with the epithets of sedition and rebellion. Will gentlemen undertake to say that such is our present state of preparation, or that similar results are to be expected? I did hope, sir, that our remote distance from the great disturbers of human repose, would have permitted us to be exempted from those perpetual alarms, those armings and counter-armings, which have raised the national debt of Britain to its present astonishing amount, and which sends her laborers supperless to bed. This is the mischief which poisons the happiness of that country, of all others perhaps the most blessed in point of soil, climate, and position.

I am friendly to the resolution on your table, sir, on another ground. I believe that it will remove a considerable cause of irritation. The raising of these troops has had a deleterious effect upon the public temper. The military parade which meets the eye in almost every direction excites the gall of our citizens; they feel a just indignation at the sight of loungers, who live upon the public, who consume the fruits of their honest industry, under the pretext of protecting them from a foreign yoke. They put no confidence, sir, in the protection of a handful of ragamuffins; they know that when danger comes they must meet it, and they only ask arms at your hands. Gentlemen have talked of organizing the militia; I call upon them to make good what they have said. Instead of reducing this force, I could wish to see the whole of it, reprobated as it is by our citizens, abandoned, and the defence of the country placed in proper hands, those of the people.

I repeat, that if we value our Constitution, our

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1800.

peace, and public welfare, in this way we must prepare for war. By arming our people, by equipping every able-bodied man for war, you present the most terrible front to an invading foe. Our citizens are confident in their strength; they know themselves to be capable of protecting their own property and liberties; they do not want their noses held to the grindstone to pay protectors; the surpluse of their labor they wish to employ in increasing their property, in providing for their offspring—that numerous and increasing population of which gentlemen have said so much; they do not wish to have money forced out of their pockets to pay hirelings, under the stale pretext of keeping off French invasion.

But, we are asked, how we are to maintain our independence? The desultory observations which I have made are in part an answer. But the question is not the preservation of our independence. It is simply, whether we will consent to a reduction of an expensive establishment, hostile to our liberties—which cannot be brought to act against the enemy, and which, even in case of invasion, would make but a paltry part of our defence—and appropriate any saving of the public expenditure to objects of real utility. But we are told that the consistency and wisdom of our councils will be called in question, by thus retracing the steps which former Legislatures have taken. Sir, I will make some sacrifice to preserve the reputation of our councils, but I must do it at the expense of duty. If our Administration have heretofore expended the public money upon improper objects, I cannot consent to continue such measures in order to bolster up their consistency. I am willing to give them all credit where they deserve it, but not to preserve their reputation at the public expense.

The finances of the country merit our most serious attention; in my mind their situation excites a just alarm. If, indeed, the command of money by indirect methods were attended with no inconvenience; if, for the payment of every shilling which was borrowed, every foot of ground in the Union did not stand pledged, then indeed a resort to the favorite resources might not be so unpleasant. But, sir, our people view this measure with a jealous eye; they abhor the principle, they know how deceitful is the aid which it affords; they dread its consequences. Whether they are warranted in these impressions, I leave gentlemen to determine. A twenty years peace, a ten years operation of this efficient Government—what is the consequence? Your debt diminished by hundreds of thousands and increased by millions. This debt, which was contracted during the Revolutionary war, we know to be the price of our independence; we pay it without a murmur. We could wish, sir, that the revenues raised for that purpose could have been poured into the lap of the defenders of their country, rather than the coffers of speculators; but we cheerfully pay our obligations to the holders of them; we ask no questions. We have however expected to see that debt diminished, or at least the public expenditure reduced within the limits of the revenue, yet are we disappointed.

The member from Virginia (Mr. MARSHALL)

says that our economy is false; that the pay of these regiments for a few months (until we hear from our Commissioners in Paris) ought not to be put in competition with the success of that mission. Sir, in my opinion nothing save the honor and welfare of our country ought to be put in competition with that most desirable object. I repeat that if I thought this resolution tended to throw cold water upon that negotiation, I would abandon it without hesitation; our best interests are involved in its successful issue, and they are not to be weighed down by an expense much larger than what is incurred by this establishment.

But should that negotiation fail, we are asked if we shall then be prepared to abandon this defence. Sir, I will say for myself, it is impossible for this country (much as may be squeezed from the people) to support a mercenary force adequate to its protection against a powerful invading foe. The country must find protection in her sons; you must look for this invaluable good to its proper source, where you are secure against disappointment, the people. A gentleman [Mr. LEE] stated yesterday that our finances were in a prosperous condition, that the deficit was trifling, and, if much greater, ought not to demand our regard. Does it not create surprise to hear gentlemen put a smile of contempt on a deficit of five millions in a revenue of nine, and an additional increase of debt to that amount? Surely, sir, they must dissemble their feelings when they make so light of it. If our expenses were confined to such objects as necessity dictated, our people would pay them with cheerfulness. But, sir, they will justly murmur at this idle waste of their treasure.

This Committee has been told, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of this resolution goes to the prostrating our country, defenceless, at the feet of the Directory. It is, sir, by a cultivation of your militia alone that you can always be prepared for every species of attack. When citizen and soldier shall be synonymous terms, then will you be safe. When gentlemen attempt to alarm us with foreign danger, they will permit me to advert to those of a domestic and more serious nature; they will suffer me to warn them against standing armies—against destroying the military spirit of the citizen, by cultivating it only in the soldier by profession; against an institution which has wrought the downfall of every free State, and rivetted the fetters of despotism; which must produce in this country effects similar to those which it has brought about in others; unless, indeed, gentlemen suppose that the same moral and physical causes which govern the Eastern world are here suspended in their operations.

Believing this resolution to be a wise measure; in every respect to be a prudent retrenchment of unnecessary and enormous expense; entertaining a strong and well founded hostility to mercenary armies, upon every possible consideration; persuaded that it is time to reduce our expenditure within the bounds of our income, I have offered, among my desultory remarks, some of the principal causes of my support to the measure under your consideration.

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Mr. OTIS said, the progress of the debate had convinced him that the opinion he entertained at first was accurate—that much new light would not be given to this question after the first day of the discussion. Though he despaired of adding to the information already possessed by the Committee, he might possibly suggest some ideas which had not been advanced, and at the same time would attempt to enforce the arguments used by his friends in opposition to the resolution.

In the course of the general view he should take of the subject, Mr. O. said, he should animadvert on some of the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, who had just sat down, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) That gentleman had with great modesty been pleased to say that his arguments had been desultory. On this remark, said Mr. O., I will not join issue with that gentleman, but when he further says his arguments have been extremely weak, I much fear that some of the defenders of their country, in whose hearing they were uttered, will think that a part of them at least have been extremely strong.

The principal objection urged, Mr. Chairman, against the army now proposed to be disbanded, is not the absolute want of money, and insufficiency of our resources. Gentlemen do not say that we cannot borrow money, or that we cannot invent taxes, but that loans and taxes will be burdensome to the people. Sir, I would ask those gentlemen what right the people of this country have to expect to escape the conflagration in which the other three quarters of the globe are involved, without some pains and expense to erect barriers against its destructive progress? Are we chosen by heaven to live in a sequestered corner of the world, exempt from the troubles and distresses of other nations, to grow rich by their spoils, and to fatten on their misfortunes, without any additional burdens? While the Old World is wasted by fire and sword, while cities are sacked and unpeopled, their fields made desolate, and their commerce destroyed, are we privileged to count in quiet the gains of the counting-house and the produce of our acres, without deduction or alloy? Do we presume that the Atlantic would open and swallow up an invading army, as the host of Pharaoh was swallowed up in the Red Sea? Confident as I am in the justice of our cause, I do not expect the assistance of miracles for our protection. We must rely, under Heaven, upon the arm of flesh. If we do not, if we neglect to make necessary preparation against natural accidents, we may be overwhelmed in the common fate of those nations, which, lulled into a delusive security, have lost their liberties, and perished in the general wreck of the social union.

Sir, I fear that our long enjoyment of peace has led gentlemen to think that peace belongs to us by right of prescription, and that we have only to remind our souls that we have goods laid up for many years, and may eat, drink, and be merry. But, to gentlemen who reason thus, the voice of experience proclaims, in solemn accents, that this very year, for aught we know, our liberties may be required at our hands? Sir, we are told that the present establishment shows an annual deficit of five millions of dollars. But suppose, for the sake of the argument, the calculation to be just and the establishment certainly necessary; what are five millions of dollars? Or suppose that the price of our safety and independence should be twenty, forty, or, if you please, eighty millions of dollars, in addition to the present debt. This indeed, sir, is money—as M. TALLEYRAND observed—is a great deal of money; but money is cheaper than blood, it is less precious than honor. Who would hesitate, between the evils of doubling the national debt or relinquishing the rights of an independent nation? But, sir, there is no probability that we shall be called to make such a sacrifice. Mr. Chairman, I once more entreat gentlemen who deem the condition of the United States to be unprosperous, to look upon the picture of Europe, to which their attention has so often been called. Ask, sir, if you please, the calculating Dutchman, the hardy Swiss, the soft Italian, the haughty Spaniard—nay, if you please, the wretched Egyptian—ask them at what price they would redeem their ancient rights and privileges; rights and privileges indeed far inferior to those enjoyed by our fellow citizens. Or, sir, reverse the picture, and inquire of the British yeomanry, of the peasants, who, as the gentleman from Virginia says, go supperless to bed, whether they would exchange their burdens, great as they are—their conscientious pride and satisfaction, the result at once of a sense of duty and of safety, for all the advantages reaped by those whom I have just enumerated? They, sir, all of them at least who are not abject or corrupt, will agree with me, that liberty cannot be estimated by money. Sir, when we contemplate the resources of this country, either in a general or more particular view, there does not appear a sufficient occasion for the deplorable statement exhibited by gentlemen. Let us for our comfort recur to a period when, without half our present population, or a tenth part of our riches, when, destitute of Government and commerce, we were involved in a struggle of seven years with a powerful nation, and under all these disadvantages escaped with a debt of eighty million of dollars—a sum less than the expenses of that nation for one year. We now enjoy a regular and efficient Government, the agricultural and commercial capital of the country is greatly augmented, we have sixty millions of exports, nine hundred thousand tons of shipping, moneyed institutions to facilitate the operations of Government, and experience and confidence on our side. Why then will gentlemen persist in representing our finances in a low and degraded state? Why exhibit statements which diminish our weight and consequence in the eyes of other nations? I perceive no propriety or good policy in these measures. Again, sir, complaints are made that the Government cannot borrow money at a less interest than 8 per cent. But the Government borrows as cheap as the individual. It borrows at the market rate of interest, and if that rate is high, it is because the demand for money for lucrative objects is also great—it is a proof that the country is advancing in prosperity.

It has been intimated, in order to alarm the Committee, that the deficiency of our revenue compared with our expenditure is greater than that of Great Britain in a time of peace—that our revenues amount to eight millions, and our expenses to thirteen millions, so that we must borrow two-thirds of the amount of the revenue. But, sir, to say nothing of additional revenues which may be provided, let it be remembered that when the land tax is received the revenue will be nearer ten millions than eight; and that the Military Establishment may be so modified, by suspending the recruiting service, that a million, or perhaps a million and a half, may be saved in the current year. And further, if the negotiation with France succeeds, that an additional saving will be made, amounting in all to two millions and a half at least. So that in the next year, if we should beat peace, additional revenues or a loan for about two millions of dollars only would be required. And is this a state of things to create terror or alarm? Sir, as an allusion has been made to the debt of Great Britain, it may not be amiss to remark that that nation, which undoubtedly obtains money upon easier terms than any nation in the world, has not in this respect so great an advantage over the United States as may at first be imagined. She borrows nominally at a much less rate of interest; yet, when we take into view all the gratuities and expenses attending her loans, the disparity is not very great. I have a document of undoubted authority, which shows that between the years 1793 and 1799, the whole amount of money borrowed by Great Britain was - - - £117,654,225

For which she was obliged to create a capital of - - - 160,929,739
And the total annual charge on the money borrowed was - - - 7,931,215
Which is more than seven per cent. on the whole.

Mr. Chairman, too much has been said upon the subject of our finances, in the discussion of this question. The inquiry ought to be, simply, Is it prudent and essential to the true interests of the country to maintain the establishment? If so, we must sustain the expense of it. But if otherwise, it should be relinquished, however adequate our resources may be to the support of it. Is it then expedient under existing circumstances of invasion, which has occupied so much time and attention? I readily confess that I do not consider this danger so imminent as at the time when the augmentation of the army was authorized by law. At that period, the whole seacoast of France was lined with soldiers, called in the gasconading language of the country, "The Army of England." These troops meditated a descent somewhere. They were actually embarked aboard a powerful squadron, and instead of coming hither they proceeded on a crusade to Egypt and the Holy Land. But sir, who could have foretold the destination of that fleet and army? I do most solemnly declare if at that time my opinion had been requested as to the probability of their destination, either for Louisiana or Egypt, I should have considered the former the most probable; and I believe farther, that but for the length of the gauntlet which they must have run, it must have appeared the most tempting and promising expedition of the two. We also knew at that time that they had actually threatened our Envoys with danger on that quarter. We have reason to believe Louisiana has been ceded to France, and we know, since, that Carnot, the ex-Director, in a book written in his own vindication, inculcates his colleagues for not insisting upon the cession; alleging, as a reason, the control and influence which France would have thereby obtained in the United States. Under these circumstances, I thought the measures adopted by Congress necessary—I believe a great majority of the American people were of the same opinion.

Since that time, events have happened which render France less able to invade this country, if such is her disposition. Her fleets have been crippled or destroyed, and her armies find ample employment upon the continent of Europe. But who can say, that this danger, though diminished, is so entirely passed that we should remain in a situation utterly defenceless? That, because it is not a pressing and immediate danger this year, it is not possible and will not be practicable the next year? We know not, sir, the state of affairs which a general pacification of the Continent might develop. We know not how soon it may happen. Perhaps even France and Great Britain may be at peace this Winter. Probably some of the Spanish possessions in America may yet be ceded to the French Republic. These contingencies justify the maintenance of a small force. To disarm would be to provoke and encourage attempts, which an attitude of readiness and resistance would altogether prevent.

It has been said that this army was not wanted for garrison duty. The permanent establishment is 5,400 men, including non-commissioned officers. These cannot be considered sufficient in a time of danger to garrison all our ports, harbors, and fortifications, and to protect the coast and frontiers from Georgia to Maine, and from the Atlantic to the Lake of the Woods. As we know not the probable point of attack, we ought to have a few disciplined troops always ready to fly to the post of danger, to act with the militia; for it is impossible to protect our vast coast everywhere, and in every point, by a regular force.

But another and more forcible reason which operates upon me to desire this army to be preserved is, that of all arts and sciences now understood and cultivated in Europe at the present day, the military art has attained to the most considerable degree of perfection: on the contrary, I believe that of the arts and sciences known in America, the art of war is the least understood. Considering this vast disproportion, then, ought we not to have men who should learn the rudiments of discipline, who should serve for the germ of an army at least, so as to be ready when called out by requisition or by any other means? Certainly these twelve regiments, though not alone to be relied upon, in the event of war, may yet be of high importance in this view of the subject.

Among the observations made by the gentleman

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R

from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) he has urged an argument which, however ingenious, is certainly not new. He considers standing armies as opposed to the spirit of the Constitution and dangerous to liberty.

This alarm relative to standing armies has been at least rung a thousand times a year since the first British army was landed in this country; and, if the objection is well founded, it goes to the destruction of the old regiments as well as of the new, and we must have immediate recourse to militia for every ordinary object. That gentleman further contends that this country cannot be defended by a standing army, but requires a force raised by requisition. Wherein lies the difference between a standing army and a force raised for a limited time, by requisition? The gentleman may distinguish the first by the hard names of ragamuffins and mercenaries, if he thinks proper, I shall not dispute with him about terms. Yet, why troops raised according to his ideas of requisition, who are to be organized, disciplined, and compelled into service, to receive pay and march wherever they are ordered, are less ragamuffins and mercenaries than troops raised in any other mode, is for that gentleman to explain. Sir, far be it from me to question the importance of the great national resource, the militia. I well know they are the palladium of the country, the fund on which we must rely for soldiers and defence.

But I contend that militia in itself is calculated only for sudden emergencies. They will fight bravely while they continue in the field. They will resist an invading army, but they will not endure a series of campaigns. I call on gentlemen to produce an instance wherein militia have been alone equal to cope with an army that had once got a footing in a country. Remember, sir, the Swiss militia, the bravest in the world, animated by the best principles, fighting for all that was dear to them, urged on by their wives and children, armed with weapons that were furnished by despair, and dying at their sides. Yet these brave but undisciplined men were defeated and massacred, and the liberties of their country were buried in the same tomb. The gentleman further considers that wives and children are a great incentive to the bravery of the militia. This is unquestionable; but are the "mercenaries" of which the gentleman speaks precluded from the advantage of having wives and children, or will the incitement to defend them be less in one case than in the other? One thing I acknowledge, that militia when called out are sooner desirous of going home to their wives and children than regular troops—at least they cannot be prevented from it; and this is another circumstance which disqualifies them for long service. Again, the gentleman professes himself willing to apply the moneys that are requisite for the support of this army to the organization of the militia. But suppose, with the gentleman, that we have not the money—that we cannot obtain it without squeezing it from our needy constituents. He will be content to squeeze them for the sake of the militia, but not of the regular army. Sir, let us not consent to be taught by experience. Let our militia be well armed and disciplined—let us repose all due confidence in their fidelity and courage. But let us have at least a few men in the country to act with them in perilous conjunctures, to encourage and to instruct them.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to hear that gentleman make use of the word squeeze, when applied to taxation. It was the only inelegant word which escaped him, and it was certainly misapplied. Sir, it may be very proper to apply this word to the impositions of despots and arbitrary Governments; but to talk of squeezing the people in our happy country, and under our mild Government, is certainly to speak without accuracy. When the gentleman considers that at the same time he and I squeeze our constituents, we also squeeze ourselves, I think the asperity with which he pronounced that expression will be mollified. I also regret that the gentleman has discovered the gall of the people of the country moved by the sight of the Federal uniform. I have not witnessed a similar effect. I candidly confess that I do not believe a large military establishment to be a favorite project either with the people or in this House. I am aware that the apprehensions and jealousies of the people have been roused, and are now habitual, upon the subject of standing armies in times of peace. But surely these alarms must yield to good sense, to the consideration that the existence of this army is limited with the duration of our dispute and controversies with France, and becomes disbanded by the law which creates it when these shall be terminated. Surely, then, there can be no reason for any part of the community to regard unfavorably the brave men who have engaged their services for its defence. It was observed by another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) that if any original proposition to raise this army were now before us, it would not be adopted, and thence he infers that many who will now vote for maintaining it, can have no conviction of its necessity. Sir, it is very possible that if the country had not already advanced to these troops a hundred thousand dollars, for bounty, if they had not received their clothing, we might be willing to defer the raising of them for a few months. It is very possible that if a corps of officers had not been collected from their occupations, they might have still remained at home, under present circumstances. But does it follow that we should throw away all the benefit and expense of this bounty and clothing, when the men may be wanted in three months; or can we expect that these officers, if discharged, will again fly to our standard with the same alacrity?

Mr. Chairman, my strongest objection to the resolution, is the time chosen by the gentleman for offering it to the House. It is my duty to wish that our Envoys to the French Republic may avail themselves in their negotiation of the ostensible union of sentiment prevailing among the people, and of all the advantages which they carried with them to maintain the rights and honor of this country. When your late Envoys left this country they left it united in one common sentiment, except that of reluctance to come to an open rupture with France. The Directory presumed upon the appearance of division in our public councils, they calculated upon their party among the people, and they rejected your Ministers with insult and indignity. This conduct excited a general spirit of resentment, and induced the Government to prepare the means of resistance. The demonstration of the public abhorrence and indignation was loud and universal; and the consequence was an invitation to renew your negotiation. We have been told, indeed, that this invitation must not be imputed to the institution of this army, for that the act for raising it passed in July, and could not be known in August, when it is said the overtures were made by the Directory. But, sir, this law was the last of a series of measures, some of which have been adopted, and must have been known to the Directory before the month of August. In April, an act passed to increase the Military Establishment by a regiment of artillery, and to establish the Naval Department; in May, the acts for the defence of ports and harbors, and for the protection of commerce; in June, the act to suspend all commercial intercourse with France; all of which must have been well known to the Directory; and the act to augment the army is a link in the same chain. Not, sir, I presume, as gentlemen would say for us, that these measures have terrified France into a disposition to accommodate controversies; not that twelve regiments are a match for her armies, or are to be transported to her coasts, but that all the acts, taken in connexion, are an evidence of our spirit rather than of our strength; that they are a pledge of our union and further exertions, and a proof that political divisions of sentiment will vanish before a common sense of insulted dignity and national honor. Under these advantages your last Envoys have embarked; and shall their ears be wounded on their arrival by intelligence that you have begun to undo your late work, to destroy piecemeal your defensive establishments? Will it not damp their zeal, and humble their spirits? Yes, sir, disguise this measure as you please, it will prove a stumbling block to the negotiation; the Directory, with a prompt sagacity, will discern through it a weak and wavering policy, from which they will not fail to attempt to draw an advantage.

When, sir, gentlemen who are opposed to the resolution, express a readiness to modify the present Military Establishment, so as to diminish the expense, they are told that any modification whatever will produce the same effect upon the negotiation as the proposed resolution in its full extent. I beg leave to express a very different conception upon this point: in one instance we hold the purse and preserve the establishment; in the other we shall lose, first the establishment and then the purse. The one is a total departure from system, the other mere suspension of means. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of this debate I was greatly embarrassed to solve one problem. I believed and still believe the gentleman who offered the resolution to be desirous of a successful issue to the negotiation with France, but I could not reconcile this disposition with a measure calculated in my opinion to defeat it. From this however I am relieved by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia who avowed their belief that the negotiation will not succeed.

Mr. ORIS insisted, and appealed to the Committee, that they had declared that if they thought the negotiation would succeed they should be indifferent to the success of the resolution, and he did not believe it possible to assign any other rational motive for their conduct. Thus, sir, said he, gentlemen wish to anticipate our decision under a state of things very different from the present. They think that the discretion of this House cannot be trusted in such an event; that we shall be too much heated to act wisely. Really, sir, I may venture to assure those cool and dispassionate gentlemen, that this House may be safely trusted with the exercise of their Constitutional power, at any time and under any circumstances. Sir, with my friend from Delaware, I confess I have indulged mournful presentiments of the effects to be expected from a new treaty. I foresee that, like other nations, we may be compelled to realize that the dangers of peace and amity are the most serious dangers. I know that attempts will be made to demolish the whole defensive fabric which we have erected, and to replunge us into that abyss of debility and inaction from which we shall never escape a second time. With these difficulties I have always thought our Government would be doomed to struggle whenever a treaty should be concluded with France, but I did not expect to see at this time the axe laid to the root of our whole system. I flatter myself, that, like other nations who capitulate, we should at least be permitted to march out of the garrison with the honors of war, and not be called upon to surrender at discretion before we know our terms. To this measure I will never consent.

Mr. O. concluded by disapproving the intimation suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN,) that the effect of a treaty with France might probably involve the country in hostilities with another nation. He considered an allusion to such a state of things as highly premature and injudicious, and what ought not to be mentioned on that floor. He did not believe in any such consequence. Should it indeed happen, deplorable as it must be, he doubted not that every gentleman in the House would meet it with firmness; he thought nothing so likely to hasten it, as to express opinions of any such connexion between the state of peace with one country and hostility with another, and to familiarize ourselves to a belief that we cannot preserve peace with all nations. For these reasons he was ready to give the resolution a decided negative.

Mr. JONES said, he would not have risen to trouble the Committee, after such a length of debate, had he not conceived it necessary to give his reasons for the vote he should give on the present question. He had made the motion for the reference of this resolution to a Committee of the whole House, in order that it might undergo a full, free, and fair discussion; he felt himself highly gratified in obtaining the indulgence, and he would now account to the Committee how he had improved it.

Sir, said he, I should feel myself unworthy of the blessings of a free citizen, if I had not taken the subject of a standing army into my mature reflection, before I had the honor of taking a seat in this House. Upon this subject I have long ago made up my mind. But the question of the propriety of a standing army is not now to be discussed. With respect to the resolution now under consideration, I am free to confess that I think it introduced at an improper time, and that, from the present situation of our affairs abroad, it would have been more properly delayed longer. At a late stage of the session, the influence this measure might have on the negotiation, which is a specious rather than a solid objection, would not apply. I did not therefore expect to be called upon to give my vote at the present period.

This subject presented itself to my reflection at the time when this law passed, although not then a member, being a citizen, it did not escape my attention. I did not think at the time, from the information I was possessed of, that there existed any circumstance which could give ground to a probability of invasion from France or any other Power. However, it was thought otherwise by the Legislature, and preparation was made for defence. Those measures being in existence, and our Ambassadors having gone to France on an accommodating mission, I would have been satisfied to have awaited information from them without wishing any change in our posture; but as several other gentlemen, over whose conduct I have no control, have thought otherwise, I must meet the vote, and shall not shrink from it on that account. The subject having been brought up, I have given it all the direction I was capable of in the short time I had to determine. I have looked over and examined the several measures of defence which have been established against France. The result is, that in my judgment this is among the least operative, if it ought at all to be classed with those measures of defence which were established by Congress on that occasion. For it seems in some sort to attach itself to the permanent military force.

The first measure I find adopted to repel invasion was the organization of 80,000 militia. That was thought an efficient means of protection at the time, but that law has since been suffered to expire. The next step taken was to pass a law authorizing the President to raise a provisional army of 10,000 men, in case of war or invasion, or imminent danger of invasion, and to empower the President to accept the services of as many volunteer corps as he should think proper. In consequence, a number of independent corps had been formed in different parts of the continent, armed, uniformed, and equipped, at their own expense; they had offered their services, and had actually been accepted by the President, and still held themselves ready to be called out on the first emergency. It cannot be forgotten what a splendid appearance the numerous volunteer corps of this city made on a late melancholy occasion; amongst these was a considerable band of McPherson's legion of blues, composed of cavalry, infantry, and grenadiers, which he understood had associated for the purpose of being enrolled and ready for service, on the call of the President. He did not doubt that similar traits of a patriotic spirit had appeared in other large cities, and that similar corps had been formed in most of them for the same purpose. Another step taken for our defence was an act to authorize the raising of 24 regiments of infantry, a regiment and battalion of riflemen, one battalion of artillery, and three regiments of cavalry. This was called the eventual army, being authorized in case war should break out, or danger of invasion.

We come now to the naval armaments; these were 34 ships of war of different sizes, commissioned, armed, manned, and sent out to cruise against, and these as well as private armed ships were authorized to make reprisals and captures upon, the vessels of France. This was the most operative and the most consistent mode of defence entered into, or that could be, because it was by sea only that we were attacked. This he thought the only active and useful means of defence that was attached to the whole system.

But some gentlemen had supposed (he could not tell upon what grounds) that this was the commencement of a regular debilitating system, in order to prostrate the whole of our defensive arrangements. Mr. J. said he trusted it was not so; on the contrary, he hoped every part of the plan of defence now in existence would remain, except the alteration now proposed. Viewing it as he did, that the establishment of an army of 9,000 men was extremely immaterial to the support of the dignity of the nation in the view of France; viewing it as not in the least useful at the present, and perceiving not the least probability of invasion, and viewing this not as a necessary part of the defensive system, he could see no impropriety in disbanding them, and saving the expense.

Mr. J. said he would now call the attention of the Committee to the conduct of a nation from which it was become a favorite practice to draw precedents for the United States—I mean England. The last resort of that Government in all times of danger of invasion is always to the mass of the people. It will be recollected that in the war with France, in 1778, danger of invasion was apprehended; the militia were immediately imbodyed, and formed encampments in the most exposed parts of the country, to wait the event. During the present contest in Europe, when an invasion was again threatened, the same measure was adopted, the militia corps were considerably enlarged, new corps formed, volunteers accepted, and the whole people, in a manner, imbodyed to resist the invaders. The King, in his Speech to Parliament, subsequent to these events, felicitating the nation on this great display of zeal and firmness, declared that his chief reliance, in great difficulties and dangers, was on the support of his people; and, in a late review of the militia of London and

Reduction of the Army.

Westminster, he told the Prince of Orange it was the proudest day that he had ever known, to see the whole mass of the people was prepared and ready to protect their Government. The 2,500 men already raised, or the whole 9,000, if it should be thought proper to raise them, would make but a very small force towards repelling a powerful enemy.

Mr. J. said he was really astonished at the reference made by some gentlemen to the resolution, from which it was inferred that the militia were not to be depended upon in the hour of danger. If this reference were fully proved, to be sure, it would be the most powerful objection that could be made to the resolution. But he believed it would appear otherwise on the examination. Shortly after the commencement of the Revolution the whole of our force were militia, and they continued so till they were actually injured to battle, and had gained many important conquests. They went forward and eminently distinguished themselves, long before regular discipline was established among them. The battle of Bunker Hill, eminent in our early history, was achieved by men taken from their civil occupations. The brave man who led them to action had been recently called from his civil employment as a physician, but, warmed with enthusiasm in the cause he had undertaken, he fought bravely and closed his short career by a glorious death. Although this noble effort was not crowned with success, so far as to gain the victory, yet our raw troops so much weakened the enemy, and left such impressions of their own courage, that they were able to keep possession of the country around Boston and deprive the enemy of supplies until the arrival of General Washington, who had been appointed Commander-in-chief, and who finally compelled them to evacuate the place. Another instance of the enterprise and valor of militia, is the bold expedition against Canada, by a parcel of New York militia under Generals Montgomery and Schuyler; they encountered every hardship of a long and difficult march, in a most inclement season, through a wilderness, took fort St. John's and Montreal, and finally attempted Quebec itself, where, though they did not succeed, it was not for want of courage or conduct, but of the necessary means for an assault. A still more striking instance of the valor and activity of these kind of troops is the battle of King's Mountain, already mentioned. In this brilliant affair, the men engaged were not even an imbodyed militia, they were the farmers and their sons, who, fired with a just indignation at the sight of a hostile army marching through their country, spread the alarm, appointed the place of meeting, unharnessed their horses from the plough, and went to seek the enemy. They attacked a force of 1,400 men, two thirds of whom were regular British troops, under Colonel Ferguson, as gallant and noble an officer as any in the British army; they not only defeated him but actually killed or took every man. I do contend that the militia are the principal dependence for the defence of our country against invasion; to be sure, in case of actual war, it would be necessary to organize them into a regular force; but, however organized, they would still come from the mass of the people. Such men as can be enlisted into the army in time of peace, in this extensive and happy country, where labor is so well rewarded in all the various employments, would be a forlorn hope to defend the rights and liberties of a free people. It is only the people themselves, who feel interested in the happiness of their country and the safety of their property, that are the defence of this country.

A gentleman had informed the Committee that if the enlistments were now stopped it would save $1,500,000, although the resolution was rejected. However, he believed all the officers were appointed; these are the most expensive part of the establishment, and they must remain on pay. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it appeared that the Military Establishment cost $4,067,000, and that the revenue to meet the expenditures will be deficient by five millions. This money must be borrowed. By the proposition which was now made to the House, of disbanding the army, there would be a saving of $5,000,000, so that the deficiency would be reduced to 2,000,000. Mr. J. said, for his part, he would rather raise the money by a direct tax than to borrow, such was his aversion to a new loan. He would do anything rather than to involve posterity, by leaving a future generation to pay the debts now contracted. But the suspension of enlistments would not prevent the loaning of the money, because the House would proceed to appropriate sums upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which recommended the borrowing of five millions. When the proposition for the loan came before the House, it would be thought inconsistent for those who should vote to keep up the troops to vote against the loan proposed, and therefore he hoped gentlemen who were against the loan would not give their vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. J. said he was much obliged to the gentleman last up (Mr. OTIS) for furnishing proof of the improbability of invasion from France. Indeed, he had himself said, that he was not under very lively apprehensions of it from the present state of Europe. But some other gentleman had asked what change there was to induce the gentleman to bring forward this resolution. Sir, there is such a change as to make the army an useless expense. When our Ministers were insulted, I felt as great indignation at their treatment as any gentleman on the floor of this House. I acknowledge some propriety in the argument that at any time they could take troops to Europe or where they pleased, because they were in the most flourishing situation. But the change in their affairs is great; at present we find them but just surmounting the difficulties of a most unsuccessful campaign, threatened by a combination the most powerful that ever united their efforts against any nation. This powerful phalanx is not dissolved. Is it to be supposed that at this time of all others they are to send their 30 or 40,000 men across the ocean, when opposed by the more powerful naval force of Great Britain?

The gentleman from Massachusetts, said Mr. J., thought there was no probable danger of immediate invasion. Yet it might be next year attempted. I confess I do not perceive the consistency of this argument with another he used—that 3,500 men were sufficient to meet the present danger. If there is no danger to be apprehended for a year to come, why should we provide for it, and not leave it to the next Congress, who would be better able to judge of the danger, and might provide an adequate defence to meet it?

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Before he concluded, Mr. J. said, he would say a few words as to the system of borrowing money for national support. It was a fact, with which most gentlemen must be acquainted who had read British history, that if the Parliament in the reign of Queen Anne had opposed this system of borrowing, and had levied taxes and contributions on subjects equal to those imposed on them in the reign of George the Third, they would then have had a revenue equal to their expenditure, which was immense, to support the continual wars carried on in her reign, and all their burdens of national debt would have been avoided. But the contrary was their conduct, and an enormous national debt was transmitted down to posterity, which grew as it existed. They were unwilling to bear the expense incurred by themselves, but forced them upon their children. Are we willing to do this, sir? No, I trust there is too much patriotism, and too much justice in the people of the United States, and that they will rather support any expense, if necessary at this time, than encumber their successors with a growing debt.

Mr. J. concluded by saying, he believed there was not the least danger of invasion, even should the negotiation fail. But, in case so remote and unlikely an event should happen, he thought the militia or the people a much better reliance for defence, than the few regular troops contemplated by the law. He was opposed to a new loan, except in case of the greatest necessity, and knowing that these troops could not be kept up without the loans, he should vote for the resolution, and did not apprehend it could have any influence on the disposition of France towards an accommodation.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, the resolution upon the table certainly presented to his mind an aspect favorable to the interest of our common country; instead of drawing upon the Government "debility and degradation," in his opinion, it would strengthen her resources, and increase the respect of her citizens for the Administration. Instead of endangering the security of the nation it would add to its safety, and promote the happiness of the people. Under these impressions, he should do violence to his own feelings, and be unworthy of representing a free people, did he not give the proposition under discussion his most cordial support. He had frequently heard the fate of those nations who had lately lost their Governments, and in some cases the little remnant of liberty they possessed, repeated over within the walls of this House; the subject was never introduced but his sensibility was greatly excited, and the feelings of his heart much wounded, at the recital of such calamities. But when he heard gentlemen assimilate the situation of Italy, Holland, and Switzerland, to the present state of American affairs, he felt indignant at the reflection upon the American character. In those countries, the Governments were corrupt, human rights were not respected, and the tyranny of the rulers alienated the affections of the people; the intestine divisions which consequently ensued invited attack, and they fell an easy prey to French ambition. But view America, and the prospect brightens: we have a Government of our choice; and every man knows that while the Constitution is preserved his rights are secure; from revolution, therefore, we have naught to gain, but much to lose.

The wrongs France had done us, upon the ocean and elsewhere, were known to all America; everywhere the public sentiment had been expressed; and, so far as relates to resistance to foreign domination, and a determination to support our Government and independence from foreign attacks, but one opinion seemed to prevail from the Lakes in the North to the forests in the West, from St. Croix to St. Mary's. On these subjects the people think alike, and there can be no doubt of their rallying around the standard of their country when real danger threatens. It was from the prevalence of this national sentiment that he felt secure from invasion, and not from the "gauntlet" an invading foe would have to run, or from a hope that the troubled "ocean would swallow them up."

Besides the assurances of safety from foreign attack, which the bravery of his countrymen gave him, Mr. C. felt additional security from the debility of our enemy, at least so far as relates to the means of conveying war to our shores, which means unquestionably were money and ships. But from this weakness the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) seems to draw no security, and asks, "What may we not apprehend from a nation who had the boldness to attempt, and the power to effect, the invasion of Egypt?" Mr. C. said, his country was degraded by the question! Are the Mamelukes of Egypt to be compared to the citizens of the United States? [Here Mr. BAYARD explained, and declared he had made no such comparison.] Mr. C. said, he believed he had quoted the expressions of the gentlemen from Delaware accurately, and he had a right to draw therefrom his own conclusions. He would repeat, that great was the difference between the Egyptians and the citizens of America. In Egypt, the people, in want of the means of defence, involved in political slavery, and savage ignorance and poverty, became an easy conquest to an invading foe. But America was powerful in the means of self defence, and presented innumerable and insurmountable barriers to a successful attack. The expedition to Egypt had proved highly injurious to France, it pressed hard upon her fiscal resources, and so palsied her warlike arm as to render it doubtful at one time whether she would be enabled to resist with success the coalesced Powers who threatened her political existence. Mr. C. thought a remembrance of this, if other instructive lessons were wanting, would at least teach France the folly and the danger of carrying war into remote countries. Believing thus, as he did, that there was no danger of invasion, he could not see to what useful purpose this army could be applied—but, on the contrary, he saw much evil which its existence would create; among the greatest, was the increase of the national expenditure, and with it the increase of the national burdens.

Let not gentlemen flatter themselves that the present weight of Government was not felt by the people. In those parts of the Union where commerce floats by the doors of our citizens, the taxes are paid with ease, but in the interior of the States they were met with difficulty. But if this army system was persisted in, taxation must everywhere become great and burdensome. His desire was, to exact no more money from the people than was absolutely necessary. Nothing had a greater tendency to tame the spirits of a free people, and sooner to prepare their minds for political servitude, than an immense national debt and heavy taxation.

The feelings of a nation may well be assimilated to those of an individual. A man loaded with debt, and guarded by his creditors, too often loses his firmness of character, and sinks into inactivity and despair. A nation groaning under a national debt and the weight of taxes was too apt to fall into a political lethargy, and tamely to wear any yoke their rulers may prepare for them. What but this, has induced the people of England, without a murmur, to carry a corrupt Government through so many wars of ambition? What else has induced the people of England to suffer their treasure to be squandered away in the paying of foreign hirelings, to impose upon distant countries Governments not wished for by the inhabitants? And what besides has occasioned the people of England to see without complaining a war of plunder and desolation carried to the once peaceful and happy plains of India? But, to avoid immediate recourse to further taxes, gentlemen proposed the expedient of loans. This, however, was only delaying the evil; this policy is bad, as was clearly shown by his friend from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) at a late period last evening.

Mr. C. said, he had given an opinion, that the disbanding of an additional army would strengthen the resources of our country, and increase the love of the people for the Government. To his mind, nothing could be more clear. Next to freemen, money was the most powerful engine in the defence of a nation, a saving of which would insure the adoption of the resolution. Next to dispensing protection and equal justice to the people, economy tends to render an administration pleasing. But the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) was fearful, if this army was reduced, another could not easily be raised, when the occasion required it. Mr. C. could not think so; he placed great reliance upon the patriotism of his fellow-citizens, and when the country was in danger, many brave defenders would range themselves under her standard.

We have been told, said Mr. C., that of the twelve regiments, not more than 3,500 men have been raised; this convinced him that the American people did not view this army as necessary for their defence; were it otherwise, the ranks would not be so thin.

Some gentlemen were apprehensive that the adoption of the resolution would injure the pending negotiation with France. Mr. C. said, if he thought so, it would not receive his support. No man desired more heartily the success of the mission than he did. Peace was essential to the welfare of his country, and he wanted much to see it restored. But the disbanding of this little army could have no influence on the councils of France. No other inference could be drawn than this: that the American Congress, assured of their immense resources for defence, and relying on the bravery and attachment of the American people to their country, had thought proper to lessen the expenses of Government, by reducing a useless part of their military forces.

Mr. HARRISON said, the resolution had been so ably spoken to, that it could not be expected to receive any new light from what he should add. But when it was recollected that he had no other way of expressing his opinion on any subject that came before the House, than by taking part in the debate, not having a vote in the House, he trusted he need make no apology for rising on the present subject, which to him appeared an important one. He was fully of opinion that disbanding so large a proportion of the military force would be attended with disastrous consequences. In giving this opinion, he was sure he spoke that of nine-tenths of his constituents, and that they would with much more readiness bear their proportion of the expense which would be necessary to maintain these forces, than that they should be disbanded.

The employment of his past life, Mr. H. said, had led him to believe that too much reliance was placed on the militia. Were valor or alertness the only requisite in the formation of a good soldier, he should willingly give the militia that character. But these are only partial qualities compared with those which they may be called to meet. What would their valor do, attacked by the military tactics of a Bonaparte or a Massena? Nothing short of discipline will do for our forces. And are our militia well disciplined? No, sir, they are not.

Mr. H. said he had experienced the inconveniences of a militia army. In 1794, he went out with a number of the militia of his part of the country against the Indians. When brought into action they behaved very well; they did not want courage, but after a very short service they wanted to go home, they were anxious to see their families, and therefore numbers deserted, and left the army in a state which was almost the cause of its destruction. He had experienced seven years service with the militia, but he was sorry to say, such was their conduct, that he never could think of trusting the country entirely to their protection. They might do well with regular troops, and no doubt would. Under these impressions, and from this experience, he knew he spoke the will of a proportion of his constituents in sincerely hoping the resolution would not pass.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Mr. HILL.—Notwithstanding the invincible embarrassment which always oppresses me when I rise to address this House, notwithstanding my reluctance to protract the debate on this question, which I have all along considered ought to be promptly and immediately decided, I find myself impelled to offer a few observations on the subject, to make evident that my desire to press a speedy decision does not arise from the unworthy motive of forcing the minority into a measure without a full discussion of its merits; and that the sentiments which have actuated me, and will determine my vote on the present occasion, are such as forcibly impress me with the propriety and necessity of such disposition of the resolution.

I consider this question of vast importance in various points of view, whether it regards our respectability abroad or our interests and safety at home. The proposition appears to me to be fraught with mischief, calculated to involve the councils of our country in the contempt of other nations—to make them disreputable in the consideration of our citizens. While, sir, I thus freely declare my sentiments of the measure, I would not be understood to intend that an improper motive is ascribed to the gentleman who moved or the gentlemen who advocate the resolution. The human mind is so constructed that the same object of contemplation will appear differently to different persons, and even, under various views, will assume various appearances to the same mind; to this I am disposed to ascribe the want of unanimity now experienced.

To me, sir, after bestowing the most unremitting, steady attention to the arguments of gentlemen on both sides, it appears unequivocally, that the measure if adopted would produce the most fatal effects; that the proposition can but create the most pernicious influence on the pending negotiation with France. Hence, sir, it is my wish to have the resolution speedily disposed of. I believe a majority of this House unquestionably disapprove it; and the only way to prevent the pernicious influence dreaded is to let the disapprobation of the House accompany the account of the proposition. I would have the same breeze which wafts across the ocean the paralyzing intelligence of the proposition, convey to our Commissioners the restorative information of its decisive rejection. But, sir, it is said that this ill effect cannot be produced, because this army forms no part of that system of defence occasioned by French aggressions. The contrary of this is so evident, that it would be an insult on the understanding of this House to attempt to prove it. If, however, a doubt exists, a reference to the law authorizing the enlistments—to the terms of enlistment which form the contract between the Government and the soldier, will effectually conclude it. If, then, this army is part of a system of defence adopted in consequence of French aggressions, before we agree to disband it, it becomes necessary to know whether those aggressions have ceased; whether the injuries suffered have been repaired; and to examine the present state of affairs between the two countries. Will it be alleged that this is materially different from that existing when this army was organized? Will it be concluded that we are not in a state of actual war? Sir, it will not, because neither position is tenable—the facts are otherwise. Why, then, sir I ask, are we to abandon this system? It is said, because it has not, it cannot have, any useful operation—because it has not had, it cannot have, any possible effect on the French councils, while it induces a heavy expense on the American people. Sir, it has been clearly and conclusively proved, that the system adopted has had a powerful influence on the French measures. The belligerent attitude assumed by this Government, was a strong and indubitable evidence to the Government of France, that we should prefer war, with all its calamities, to submission, and loss of our independence; that we would expend our last dollar in defence of our rights, but not bestow a single cent for tribute. The change of measures evidences the change of sentiment in the French councils, and this was consequent to the adoption of this system—a negotiation is invited by those who, but a little while before, rejected with scorn and contempt a like overture. If now, in the very commencement of that negotiation, the first act of the Legislature is an abandonment, is the destruction of that system, what must be the fatal consequence? Sir, it cannot be anything less than a prostration of our national honor, dignity, and interests, at the feet of French justice, of French mercy; and all that we could have to expect would be, what the magnanimity of the Great Nation might, in its tender commiseration for us, think proper to bestow on a people whose councils are too fluctuating and too weak to assert their rights, and whose resources are unequal to their protection.

But, sir, it is said that the negotiation may fail; nay, it would seem that gentlemen calculate it will fail; and therefore it is, say they, we bring the proposition forward now, aware that we have to encounter less difficulties than if we wait the issue of the negotiation. Surely, sir, nothing can operate with more force on the mind of every member of this House favorable to the measures of Government, resisting such encroachments, than this declaration; it must decide every mind on the propriety of making a firm stand against this present attempt. It is further stated that the army cannot be useful because invasion is impracticable, or if practicable, still it cannot be useful, on account of the paucity of its numbers, and for other reasons. Both these positions have been so ably assailed, and the assertions so conclusively refuted, by two gentlemen from Virginia, that it would be but waste of time to enlarge on the subject. I will only observe, that possibilities more remote have been sustained in the French councils, and have proved practicable in their execution. Calculations founded on the events of former wars, are not admissible as correct indications of what may occur in the present war. Never in modern times has a war sustained as this has been existed. Perhaps the present are the only times which ever witnessed a single nation, unaided by allies, carrying war and havoc in every direction, through various nations at the same time, with such a combination of Powers to resist, and sustain itself, victoriously, as the French nation has done.

Are we to satisfy ourselves with the belief that the French will not invade us, and become unprepared to defend ourselves, while in actual war with that Power? Sir, is not this inviting invasion? But, admit that invasion is not to be dreaded—is that the only means the French have of annoying us of disturbing the peace, and introducing war into our country?

While we are considering whether our Constitutional power to adopt measures to repel invasion is or is not expedient to be exerted, let it not be forgotten, our country has a vulnerable side, other than that exposed to invasion; a point, sir, that will not escape hostile notice; a point, sir, which the Southern States have most to dread, and where, if war in our country is to happen, it will probably commence.

As to the expense to be incurred by maintaining the army proposed to be discharged, it is admitted it cannot be much; too trifling, it is acknowledged, to be an object, if the mission to France succeeds. In that event it is merely questionable whether there would be any saving at all by disbanding the army now, as most probably the pay which may be considered as proper to bestow on its discharge, would be fully equal to its support during the whole period of its enlistment.

Much has been said on the subject of economy. Truly, sir, it is an important consideration, and ought always to be present in our councils. But, sir, economy consists in a due application of the wealth and resources of the country; to promote measures calculated to produce the peace, safety, and happiness of the citizens; to insure the prosperity and welfare of the Republic. This kind of economy is as distant from the paltry considerations of an impolitic parsimony as it is removed from the waste of an inconsiderate prodigality. I therefore consider what has been urged on that subject as of no moment in the present question; and much better calculated to tickle the ears of an unreflecting populace, than convince the minds of a deliberative assembly. It has been alleged that the existence of this army occasions unpleasant sensations in the minds of the citizens at large; that the sound of the drum and the glitter of arms among their peaceful habitations distresses them. Sir, doubtless it excites their attention, and produces from them inquiries on the subject, but when told that this army is raised to be ready to protect the rights and support the honor of their country, which has been and still is injured and insulted by a foreign Power, they are satisfied. But what would be the operation of the measure proposed on the minds of these very citizens? They find the army disbanded, they inquire what reparation has our Government received for the injuries, what satisfaction for the insults, heaped on our country? None. Why is the army then disbanded, and, after the expense of organization for the defence of our country, why are we now left without the proposed means of defence? Sir, can these questions be answered without involving our Government in the disrepute of its citizens? No, sir, it must forcibly attach to it in every mind.

It has been urged that the wisdom and prudence of this House are involved in the present question. I sincerely coincide in this sentiment. I will go further: the dignity, sir, of this House is involved in entertaining this question. I call loudly to be extricated as speedily as possible. Scarcely, sir, has a month elapsed since this House, without a division, announced to the American people, to the world at large, that it is the dictate of wisdom, of duty, to persevere in the system of defence adopted by the councils of our country. This sentiment is emphatically expressed in the Address of this House to the President. And we are now, without even the suggestion of a change of situation, called on to make an inroad on that system, to commence its destruction.

I hope, sir, the question will be taken this day. I feel every disposition to accommodate gentlemen in their feelings and wishes, but I hold the interests of the country, which I sincerely believe to be involved in the length of this debate, as too expensive a sacrifice. I apprehend every gentleman has made up his mind, without the probability of relinquishing the point on which it rests; if so, a further postponement can only be to afford an opportunity for a display of oratory. If gentlemen have made up their minds, and if it is important that a prompt decision should be had, it will be better to take the vote now and have the speeches afterwards—they doubtless will prove entertaining and instructive essays; and this course will be considered less exceptionable, as it has been exemplified with no small success by an ancient orator of celebrity. I allude to Cicero, and his oration in defence, but not heard until after the trial, of his friend Milo. It is true it was of no manner of service to his friend—but it was nevertheless a very fine speech, and contributed not a little to increase the fame of his eloquence. I hope, therefore, sir, that this course may be taken, rather than the decision should be any longer delayed.

At this point the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 10.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. MORRIS in the Chair, resumed the consideration of Mr. NICHOLAS'S resolution for reducing the Army Establishment.

Mr. KITCHELL thought that the question before the Committee had been treated by the gentlemen on both sides upon much too extensive grounds, many of which had nothing at all to do with it. It appeared to him that the real merits of it would be better ascertained, and a vote taken with much more propriety, if it only rested on these two points, to which he wished to call attention:

First. What would its influence be with the French Directory in the present state of the negotiation?

Secondly. What would be its influence or use in case of invasion?

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

These were the principal grounds on which it was opposed, but, he conceived, without much foundation. As to its influence on our negotiation with France, he thought the arguments very weak. Could it be supposed that an army of three or four thousand men, at a distance of at least three thousand miles, could bid defiance to a Power that the combination of all Europe would not appal? That must be an absurd conclusion. This small army could not possibly affect a negotiation when the Atlantic separated the Powers. In what form could they be used to attack the French? Could they be transported across the ocean to compel the Directory to attend to the terms we should dictate? If the attempt was made, our great and good allies would meet, and very probably impress them into their service. Or was a bridge to be laid across for their transportation to Europe? But, if they could get there, what would they do? These notions, he believed, would be acknowledged absurd; but in what other way could the preservation of this army influence the Directory? Yet gentlemen had ascribed to it that wonderful power. He concluded it could have no such effect.

But the gentleman from Delaware said, if the French could have emissaries here to direct our councils, they would recommend such a motion as this. No, said Mr. K., they would rather advise or influence us to augment the forces, in order to drain our resources, so that we should be unable to meet them, if they had any design upon us. They would wish rather to disable us from making any opposition, which could be more effectually done by leaving us without money than without troops. Not that he conceived our financial state to be at so low an ebb as to disable us in any event from keeping up the army, but while our expenditure was already more than our revenue, it would certainly be imprudent not to attend to every opportunity of decreasing it, so as to bring it as nearly level as possible.

Farther. What effect could this army have in case of invasion? What would our whole army, of fifteen or sixteen thousand men, do against the great number any European Power, who was so inclined, could throw into our country? If such madness should seize them as to send an army here for the invasion of our country, could it be supposed that they would immediately send a flag of truce to inform us of the manner of its execution? Certainly not. Would they not be so well acquainted with our country and situation as to land where these troops could not be brought to operate against them? Then can we suppose that the keeping up of these men, at the rate of four millions of dollars a year, will compel France to do what we please? No, sir, this army would not be found, were a disembarkation to take place; and our militia would have to stand the whole attack.

Mr. K. believed that at any time a well armed, and well disciplined militia would be competent to all the purposes required to make head against an invasion from any nation. He therefore thought that while a standing army of this force would be useless to make any impression on the French mind, so it would on their armies, if they actually invaded the country. He did not believe that the people could not support this army; they could, or one ten times larger, if necessary, and they would do it in that event. But he was confident that a cheaper and more efficient protection was to be found in the people of the United States. Suppose this army were to be divided to guard different parts of the coast. Our coasts are so extensive that there could not be a sufficient quantity at any one point to do any good against an army that should invade, and therefore what use could they be in that service?

Mr. K. said he merely threw out these ideas to show his reasons for voting in favor of the resolution, which he must do unless his objections, and some others which had been mentioned by gentlemen who spoke before him, were satisfactorily removed. He thought the money could be better applied to arming and disciplining the militia, and he never could give a vote to impair that great foundation of our strength, which ought to be cultivated with assiduity. Nor was he anywise apprehensive of invasion if the war in Europe should cease, because of the affinity of France and Great Britain to each other, which would operate as a sufficient check. Besides, it could not be supposed that after a war of this great length, and unprecedented for fatigue and sanguinity, either of those Powers would enter on new adventures, when a few years rest and peace would be so requisite to recruit their men as well as their finances. It was said that in another year they may invade us, and therefore we ought to preserve the army. To be sure it was possible, but the argument would lead to making provisions for another century. If there is any way, said Mr. K., in which we can attack the French Republic, it must be by sea; we have no fear of them by land, because they will not attack us, and it is not probable we shall attack them. If, indeed, that is our wish, we must increase our force, instead of diminishing it. They do distress our commerce, we ought not therefore to be negligent of our navy, but to protect it; but as for an army, we can have no use for it.

Mr. S. SMITH believed, with two gentlemen who had lately spoken, that if a bill was now brought in to create the army in question, it would have very few advocates. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) had said, that if he had voted for raising this army, he certainly should now vote for its continuance, because he saw no change in circumstances sufficient to warrant any change in measures. Mr. S. said, he disagreed with that gentleman: he did not think the same occasion now existed.

Mr. S. said, he came to Congress this year with a strong impression upon his mind that the expense of this army was an unnecessary one; but he did not expect such a resolution to be brought forward at so early a period of the session. He had hoped that the gentleman would have delayed his motion until every document relating to the army was laid before the House by the Secretary of War, and every document of finance from the Treasury Department. Unprepared as he was, and unwilling as he was to vote, he was called on now so to do, and therefore must vote upon such documents as were in possession of the House.

He conceived it necessary to call the recollection of gentlemen to the state of affairs when the law in question had passed. It had been thought proper, by the Senate of the United States, to publish the despatches of our envoys to France, which by him, and many others, was considered in no other light than as a manifesto to prepare the minds of the people for war; for all had declared that France could not do otherwise, after their publication, than declare war. The House thought so, and declined the publication on their part. However, having been made public, it became a duty to assume a posture of defence; the necessity of which so strongly impressed him, that he could not have returned to his constituents without seeing the proper measures taken.

It had been said, that this part of the army was not a part of the system of defence. What else could it be? To be sure it was not the only means of defence adopted, but it was considered that this army would operate valuably as a rallying point round which the militia would assemble. It was thought that wherever the United States should be invaded, the enemy would first be met by the militia, and that these troops, being prepared, would rapidly come to their aid.

Under these impressions, Mr. S. said, he had thought it his duty to bring forward a resolution for raising eight regiments, and six troops of dragoons; the House carried it further, and voted twelve regiments and the dragoons. The measure was then thought to be so essential a feature of our defence, that there were but eleven members who voted against it. It will be recollected that a gentleman expressed an opinion that the right wing of the Army of England (as it was then called) would probably come to this country; although he had no such idea, he had thought that the Southern States might be in danger of a descent from Hispaniola, and therefore thought that a small army might be necessary.

It would not be considered improper for gentlemen to vote for continuing the men who had been recruited into the twelve regiments a few months longer; for although they could not be draughted into the old regiments, yet many of them might and probably would be recruited for those regiments, and a saving of clothing, &c., would thereby be effected. He presumed something like this was the middle ground contemplated by the gentleman from Virginia. At present no regiment appeared to have more men than would make a battalion. The supernumerary officers might therefore retire home till called for, and thus make a considerable saving.

From the reports of the War Department, Mr. S. said there were no more than 3,399 men recruited for that service; many of these would be objected to when they came to the muster, so that they would probably be reduced to 3,000; 8,520 was the total number of men wanted for the twelve regiments. By stopping the enlistments, there would be a saving of bounty and clothing for 5,520. The raising of the six troops of dragoons (no men being yet engaged) might also be stopped, and the whole expense of their bounty and clothing, besides the purchase of horses, would be saved. Under this statement of facts, would gentlemen think of destroying this army at once? Would it not be more prudent to wait two or three months for advices from our Envoys? He felt well assured in his own mind that a peace would be the result of our negotiation. If gentlemen thought with him, they would wait the event. If successful, the army would of course be discharged under the law.

The resolution, Mr. S. said, was calculated to discharge all these men without a single shilling to carry them home. He trusted they would not be sent home without such provision as had been usual to make.

This army had been called a standing army, and it was said that excuses would be found to keep it up, even after a peace. But this cannot happen, for the law expires, "whenever the differences between France and America are made up."

Sir, said Mr. S., there is no man that places more reliance on the militia than I do, but before I place all my reliance on that truly essential part of our defence, much as I admire it, I must see a better militia law framed than exists at present. Until that time, I must say that a regular army in case of war will be always deemed necessary. I was pleased to hear the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) say that something like a requisition was necessary, and that the money appropriated to this army ought to be applied towards disciplining our citizens, that they may be ready on an emergency. But how can that gentleman make these men serviceable under the present militia law, when their time of service is so short, that in many instances it will be nearly expired before they can arrive at the scene of action? Sir, a requisition might be useful in this country. It is the youth of a nation that can most easily be made its effectual defence; France has proved it—oppressed by the great Powers of Europe, in a manner deprived of her soldiery, she called out by requisition the young men from eighteen to twenty-three. What was the consequence? The veterans of Europe were not able to withstand this shock, and France was everywhere victorious. Again oppressed by numbers, the armies of France, pressed by the troops of Russia and Austria, were defeated at all points, and again she had recourse to the young men. The conscripts (being those who had passed the age of eighteen since the first requisition) were called on; they joined the armies of their country, and the proud armies of the allies fled before them, from the morasses of Holland and from the mountains of the Alps, and victory again decided for the armies of France.

Mr. Chairman, grant a militia law such as has twice been reported to this House, where the youth from eighteen to twenty-five are selected, in which a plan is digested for arming, disciplining, and holding them in a constant state of preparation, and with power of keeping them in the field a sufficient length of time, and I do not hesitate to say that an army on a regular establishment will be rendered wholly unnecessary. America would then feel herself perfectly secure; an army of 120,000 young citizens, well armed and well trained, would deter all nations from an attempt at invasion. The truth being, that there are not more men recruited for the new regiments than would fill the permanent army, of course no extraordinary expense will be incurred beyond the usual estimated expenses of the army, except that of the officers of the twelve regiments; the amount of which was not such as in his opinion ought to induce a conduct that would have but too much the appearance of versatility in our Government. He should therefore vote against the motion, under a firm reliance that the recruiting service would be stopped immediately.

Mr. HARPER said: What, Mr. Chairman, would be the effect of this motion, if adopted, on the negotiation now pending between this country and France? What would be its effects on the state of this country should the negotiation fail? Such are the questions which arise out of the resolution upon your table, and present themselves for the consideration of this Committee. So strongly am I impressed with their magnitude, that I should regard myself as a traitor to that country which gave me birth, and in defence of which I drew my sword before fifteen years had passed over my head, dead to every feeling of that patriotic affection for it which I drew in with my mother's milk, were I to pass over, with a silent vote, questions so deeply interesting to its honor and welfare. These questions, indeed, have been so ably discussed, that I am far from hoping to urge any new reasons, or to adduce any additional information; but if I can renew the impression formerly made, which the length of the discussion may have in some degree obliterated, I shall consider the time which I may occupy as not wholly misspent.

What then, Mr. Chairman, let me be permitted again to ask, will be the effect of this motion, if adopted, on the success of our negotiation with France? What would be its effects on our safety should that negotiation fail?

The motion from which these questions arise, becomes infinitely more important and alarming to my mind, when combined with the avowed object for which it is introduced. Gentlemen tell us, most explicitly, that it is not on the success, but on the failure of the negotiation, that their motion becomes altogether necessary; because, in that case, the army, by the very terms of its establishment and of the act under which it was raised, is to be disbanded. The troops were enlisted to serve "during the continuance of existing differences with France." Should these differences be terminated, which is the object of the pending negotiation, the troops are disbanded of course. This gentlemen well know; and, therefore, they feel that their motion would be wholly unnecessary in case the negotiation should succeed. They even tell us, in plain terms, that did they consider the success of the negotiation as certain, they should feel very little solicitude about the motion. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GALLATIN) declares that he should not, in that case, think it worth while to make this motion; and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who brought it forward, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) fully concurs in this sentiment. But it is precisely because they think that the negotiation may fail, that they feel anxious to carry this measure. It is because they think that we may be left in a state of war with France that they wish to disband the army. It is because we may have to contend with a powerful and an insidious foe, which shall have refused to treat with us, and may meditate an immediate blow against our country, that gentlemen wish to deprive us of this arm of force for our defence. It is not in case of peace they wish to reduce, to disband, the national force, but in case of war; a war, too, against a Power whose constant policy it is to divide and conquer; to avail itself of every party contention, every internal discontent, every jealousy against Government, in order to disarm those on whom it intends an attack; to employ every act of intrigue, and hold out every insidious appearance of friendship, for the purpose of lulling into a false and fatal security the victim which it has destined for its future prey.

Sir, it is this view of the subject which strikes my mind with awful alarm. It is not foreign force that I dread, but internal division: it is not an attack from without that fills me with apprehension, but a weakness within, arising from timid counsels, which may prevent us from exerting our strength; from party animosity, which may render one half of the country the instrument for destroying the other; from jealousy of our own Government, which may prevent us from entrusting it with the means of defending us against the enterprises of another. I have heretofore been charged with endeavoring to spread alarm; and I have confessed the charge; for, when I feel alarm, I hold it my duty, as one of those persons to whom this nation has confided the task of watching over its safety, to spread that alarm. When danger is abroad, it is the duty of the sentinel to give the alarm; and it is by being alarmed that, alone, we can be saved. And I confess, sir, that when I see men, no doubt of the best intentions, so blinded by the spirit of opposition, so carried away by party animosity and jealousy of the Executive, as to struggle, with all their might for the disbandment of the army in the midst of a war; as to contend, with the most persevering zeal, that the failure of the negotiation is the precise case in which we ought to divest ourselves of our only regular disciplined force, I do feel extreme alarm, and am most awfully anxious for the fate of my country. This alarm it is my desire to spread, for I am fully convinced that unless we take the alarm, in occasions like this, we must be lost.

But to return, Mr. Chairman, from this digression, into which I was irresistibly impelled by the force of my feelings, let me be permitted to discuss the first of the two questions which present themselves for our consideration. Let me inquire, what must be the effect of this motion, should it succeed, upon our negotiation with France? Out of this question, sir, will arise two others, which ought to be separately considered. In what manner must the French Government be affected, in the pending negotiation, from this measure? How must it affect the conduct of our own Government? Under these two points of view, permit me to examine the measures.

When gentlemen who support this motion, have endeavored to answer the question, "in what manner the conduct of the French Government, in the pending negotiation, must be affected by this measure?" they seem to me to have fallen into a great, I had almost said an unaccountable, mistake. They have spoken of the amount of the force which it is the object of this motion to reduce, and they have triumphantly asked, "Will France be deterred or overawed by an army of ten thousand men? Will her Government, after having broken and triumphed over one most formidable coalition, and successfully resisted the progress of another, be induced to treat with us by the fear of this handful of troops? Will she regard this as the whole force we have to resist her, in case she should attack us?" To all these questions, sir, I answer no. She will not be deterred by this handful of troops. The fear of ten thousand men will not induce her to treat with us. She will not consider this as the only force which we can oppose to her attacks. But these, sir, are not the true questions to be determined. France will not advert to the mere amount of force to be reduced, but to the spirit to be displayed by the reduction. This is the point of view and the only one in which she will regard this measure; and the impression which it is calculated to make on her, in that point of view, is the important subject which we are now called to consider. What inference with regard to our situation and our councils, will France draw from a disbandment of our army at this moment? How will that influence affect her conduct in the negotiation? These, sir, are questions which it is our duty to solve, before we adopt the resolution on your table.

Will France consider this disbandment as an indication of a want of strength, of want of means, of inability to support this force? No, for she well knows the extent of our means, and the greatness of our strength. She knows them from the exertions made under her eye, in the Revolutionary war, at a time when we were but infants compared with our present state. She knows them from the exact information which she possesses respecting our commerce, our maritime wealth, our population, our finances, and our rapid increase. On all these particulars we cannot doubt but that she is perfectly well informed. It has been at all times a leading maxim in the policy of her Government, to spare no pains or expense in acquiring the most accurate information on all these points, respecting the countries comprehended in her political system. For this purpose she has at all times maintained skilful agents in all the countries with which she had connexions. Can we suppose, even for a moment, that she has departed from this maxim in our case? We know that she has not. Besides the secret agents, whom there is every reason to believe that she has always kept amongst us, we know that there resided here, for three years, a person of the most comprehensive, active, and discerning mind, unwearied in his pursuit of information respecting our affairs, and perfectly well qualified for obtaining it. We know that this person was recalled to France and placed in a very high and influential station in her Government. We know that he carried with him the most exact information that has ever gone to Europe respecting everything in this country that can be known by a foreigner. And although he has since been removed from his official station in France, yet there cannot be a doubt that the communications, which he made and the opinion he impressed have had, and will long continue to have, a powerful influence on the conduct of his Government towards this country. The facts which he related and the statements which he was in a condition to make, and no doubt did make, will at least remain and be remembered; and they are sufficient to inform the Government of France that our strength would be great were we disposed to exert it, that our means are extensive and abundant should we resolve to employ them. That such is, and from the beginning of her present struggle has always been her impression, is rendered perfectly manifest by the anxiety which she has shown and the pains which she has taken to draw us into the quarrels on her own side. She well knew the use of such an ally; she was fully assured of the aid which we could afford for the accomplishment of her great purpose, the destruction of the English commerce and marine, and therefore, with a policy equally profound and comprehensive, she early took every step in her power to secure this aid. We well know that early in the year 1793, as soon as her contest with England had commenced, she sent a Minister here for the express purpose of inducing us, by every artful pretext and insidious contrivance, to join her in the war. We know that when her intrigues were baffled, she resorted to menaces and violence for the same purpose. All this proves, in the most undeniable manner, that she has a very high and adequate opinion of our force. Her desire to gain the disposal of this force would not otherwise have been so ardent, nor her mortification and rage so excessive at finding herself disappointed. She will not therefore, she cannot, consider this measure as an indication of our want of means. She well knows that we possess them. She has hitherto found that we were not only too wise to be inveigled by her insidious policy, but too strong to be bent by her force. In what light, then, will she consider this measure? She will consider it, sir, as a most decisive proof that our divisions have arisen to such a height as to render us incapable of exerting our strength; that although we were, for a moment, roused into something like spirit, by the unheard of insults and indignities wherewith she loaded us in the wantonness of her pride, we are of a character too feeble and timid to support, with persevering courage and unshaken firmness, the hazard of a great conflict; that our people are too jealous of each other and of their Government to unite, for any length of time, in vigorous measures; too inert to support the fatigues of a continued exertion, or too avaricious to pay its expenses. That our Government is feeble in itself; destitute of confidence in the magnanimity and patriotism of the nation; or so clogged in all its movements, by the opposition of a powerful party, as to be rendered incapable of adhering with steadiness to any great and manly system for the protection of its honor or national rights. That there exists among us a great and powerful party which is impelled by party spirit, by animosity against its rivals, by jealousy of the Administration, by its own political system, or by whatever other motive, to exert all its force with unabated zeal, and at length with complete success, for wresting from the Government every means of defence, for depriving it of all means of exerting national force, for robbing it of all hope of public support, by withdrawing from it, completely, the public confidence. That this party, in fine, about whose existence she is but too well informed, and whose principles and views it is not natural for her to mistake, has at length obtained an ascendancy in our councils, and will not fail in the pursuit of its own plans, whatever they may be, to serve effectually her cause, by tying up the hands of the Administration, separating the nation from the Government, and neutralizing, by means of that division, the national force.

These, sir, are the circumstances of which this motion, if adopted, must be considered by France as a certain indication. Believing these circumstances to exist, she must consider our wealth, our population, our commerce, our capital, our shipping, in fine our national means, not as a force to be dreaded, but as a prey to be seized. The greater these means, the richer will be the spoil, and the more eager she will be to seize it, and to continue the quarrel which is to furnish the occasion. But resist the motion and all these indications are at once wrecked; she will then consider our national means, not as a prey to be seized, but as a force to be overcome; and, knowing as she does, the extent of those means, she would be induced to put an end to a quarrel from which she would see there was so little to be gained.

Mr. Chairman, we know the men who guide the councils of France. We have seen their conduct for six years past. Unfortunately for mankind, they have acted a most conspicuous part on the theatre of the world. We have been enabled to discover their characters, their views, and the means, as well as the object of their political system. We know that it is by fomenting internal discontent, by availing themselves of the weakness resulting from the jealousy of Government, and party divisions, that they have triumphed and still hope to triumph over other countries. In other countries they have found parties that aided their views; and when they see a party here pursuing measures exactly similar, why should they not expect some aid from that party? Sir, I speak not of the motives of gentlemen—God forbid that I should doubt, much less call in question the purity of their motives! Among those who support this motion, there are many with whom I have the advantage of being much acquainted, whose characters I highly respect, and whose intentions I believe to be most upright. But I am constrained—it is my duty—to speak of the effects of their conduct; and I must remark, that those effects will be precisely the same, from whatever motives their conduct may flow. If France find a party among us which strips us of our defence in the midst of a quarrel with her; which disbands our regular disciplined force at the moment when our negotiation shall have failed; it is the same thing, in her view, whether this be done through a mean and foolish parsimony, through versatility and weakness of character, through party spirit, animosity against the Administration, jealousy of the Government, or a direct intention to promote her views. In either case she will consider her views as promoted; because, in either case, the country will appear to her to be left at her mercy. Sir, she will have ground for this opinion—the ground of experience—for she has found her views most effectually promoted by a similar state of things in other countries. The example of other countries cannot be too often recurred to, for it is from the misfortunes and errors of others that, if we are wise, useful lessons for our conduct will be drawn.

Let it then be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the independence of Switzerland was subverted by a party; not a party among the people, for they were united, and were attached to their Government, and eager to defend their country; but a party in the Government itself. The example of the deplorable effects of foreign force and intrigue aided by internal division, has already been noticed, but it cannot be too often held up to our view, for nowhere else shall we be able to find so many points of resemblance with ourselves, so many considerations applicable to our own situation. Let me therefore be permitted to dwell for some time on this most interesting and affecting picture.

When I speak of Switzerland, Mr. Chairman, I mean to be understood especially of the Canton of Bern—the most powerful by far of the whole confederacy, and the only one able to exert a great force of itself, to stand as a bulwark for the rest, and to give union and system to their common efforts. The people of Bern, sir, were not that oppressed and degraded peasantry, of whom an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has spoken, and whom he represented as being so ground down by the miseries resulting from their own Government, that they fled with joy into the arms of the invaders, for protection against their domestic tyranny. Let me inform that honorable gentleman, that there was neither misery, oppression, nor discontent among the people of Bern. Nowhere was more happiness to be seen; nowhere more prosperity, more comfort, more security for person and property, a more perfect exemption from the burdens of taxation, more contentment to be found. In addition to the united voice of every historian and every traveller, who has viewed or attempted to represent this delightful picture of human bliss, let me refer the honorable gentleman from Virginia to the testimony of a gentleman who now hears me, who has a personal knowledge of that once happy people, and from whom the honorable gentleman may derive much useful information on this and many other subjects. That gentleman will inform him, as he has informed me, that the Government of Bern, however defective in theory, was, in its practice and administration, the best that mankind has ever seen; that there was no tyranny and no misery in Bern; that the people loved the Government, and were at all times ready to fight in its defence; that the Government cherished the people, and maintained them by a tender and paternal exercise of authority, in the possession of every blessing which Government was originally instituted to secure. Among such a people, there could be, there was no party division. The Government, indeed, was in the hands of a certain number of families, they were numerous, and operated as a check upon each other; they were venerated, and that veneration produced a willing obedience to their authority; the manners of the country were pure, and those manners contributed largely towards preventing the usual abuses of power. The mass of the people was excluded, indeed, from all share in the Government, but they felt all its blessings, and were willing to be exempt from its labors and its cares; and any among them who became distinguished by their talents, their virtues, or their services, found an easy admission into the order which held the Government. In fine, sir, they were wedded to it by the habits of three hundred years, during which it had existed in prosperity and honor. But, although there were no divisions or discontents among the people, two parties existed in the Government itself. These parties, as in all other Governments partaking of a popular nature, long struggled for superiority and rule, but, until the French Revolution broke out, and the war which its leaders, to serve their own purposes, immediately excited against the great Powers of Germany approached the borders of Switzerland, those struggles were productive of little injury. The shock produced by those events was soon felt in Switzerland. The party which at the same time possessed the chief magistracy of Bern, foreseeing the danger whereto the country would be exposed, attempted to adopt a firm and vigorous policy, to put the country in a state of defence, and to take measures for causing its neutrality and its rights to be respected by France, when a disposition to disregard both was early displayed. The opposite party, which, let it be remembered, sir, was not a French party, and would have spurned the imputation of French prepossessions, much more of French connexions or views, with the utmost indignation, did not fail, however, to oppose all these attempts, sometimes on the ground that they would irritate France, sometimes because they would be too expensive, and sometimes because there was no danger. During the whole war this conflict continued. One party took hold of every favorable occasion to use its system of defence and preparation, while every new injury or insult from France was palliated by the other, which, aided by the cautious policy of the French Minister in Switzerland, by the fear of expense and exertion natural to the people everywhere, and by the indolence of character which wealth and a long continued peace had produced, perpetually succeeded in its opposition, and kept the nation in an alarmed state.

Many injuries were endured, many insults were submitted to, but no direct attack was made on the part of France while the war with the Emperor continued. Sufficient materials for a future quarrel were however provided; and no sooner did the House of Austria make a truce with France, by which the latter was left in possession of Italy and the Rhine, than this quarrel was openly begun, and an attack on Bern, which alone stood in the way of France, was secretly planned. For this purpose a part of Bonaparte's army commanded by General Brune, was ordered to advance into the neighborhood of the Pais de Vaud, a part of Bern, and to support a handful of wretches, who had been excited by the French Government to rise in insurrection. One party in the Government of Bern wished to send a general to suppress this insurrection, and drive off Brune's army, which was not considerable in force. The other party, which called itself the peace party, and which acted and talked as our pretended peace party has always done, opposed this measure with success, and procured a negotiator to be sent instead of a general. This negotiator was also entrusted with military powers, but he belonged to the peace party, abandoned the country to the insurgents and to General Brune, with whom he entered into a negotiation instead of fighting him. The consequence was, that Brune advanced into the Pais de Vaud, took possession of it, revolutionized it, and conquered it, although nineteen-twentieths of the people were firmly attached to their Government, and ready to risk their lives in defence of the country, had there been any one to unite and direct their exertions. Having achieved this conquest, and levied an enormous contribution for the supply of his army, General Brune advanced to the frontier of Bern itself.

This invasion, however, roused the nation and the Government. The peace party, which still talked of irritation, and of expense, and of negotiation, was overborne, and preparations were made for a vigorous defence of the country. In this state of things, Brune found himself too weak for the enterprise, and had recourse to negotiation, till another body of troops, amounting to twenty thousand, could be brought from the Rhine, by General Shauenburg, to his aid. He sent negotiators to Bern, to negotiate with the peace party, and by means of the peace party to suspend the measures of defence till Shauenburg could have time to arrive. The peace party entered into his views; they negotiated; the measures for driving Brune out of the country were suspended, and Shauenburg advanced by rapid marches. At length he approached the opposite frontier, got possession of the passes which lead into the country, and attacked one of the neighboring cantons.

Then the Canton of Bern again roused itself. The people called aloud on the Government to take measures for the defence of the country, and demanded to be led against the enemy. The pretended peace-makers were silenced, the real friends of their country gained a majority in the Council of Bern, and General D'Erlach received orders to take immediate measures for attacking the enemy and driving him from the country. The patriotic enthusiasm of the people soon supplied him with an army of 30,000 men; the confidence of the nation revived, and the country was on the point of being saved.

Now begins the mournful history of the delusion of party. General D'Erlach left the Council, of which he was a member, and went to take the command of the army. One hundred officers, also members, attended him to the field. Their absence threw the majority again into the hands of the peace party—the party that talked of negotiating with an advancing enemy, of expense, of irritation, of the horrors of war. This band of misguided and timid men, led on and instigated by a faction of modern patriots—not such as Cato, as Hampden, or as Washington, but of that bastard race of patriots of the present day, whose patriotism consists in devotion to the will of France—struck the blow under which their country sunk, perhaps to rise no more. Availing themselves of the majority thus acquired, they obtained a reversal of the orders to General D'Erlach, and procured an order that he should retreat. This fatal order, the pretext for which was to avoid irritation and leave the door still open for negotiation with an invading advancing enemy; this order once given, the energy of the nation was completely unstrung. The people and army of the country, astonished and indignant at this very unaccountable weakness and versatility, which they attributed to the treachery of their Government and their officers, gave up the public cause in despair. Some refused to obey, some fled to their homes, and some turned against their officers those arms which they were not permitted to employ against the invaders of their country. Everywhere distrust, confusion, and flight, were seen, while the enemy, feeling the favorable moment, advanced with rapidity against the city of Bern, in different directions. Then the last struggles of despair took place. A brave people, deprived of leaders, deprived of government, deprived of all means of resistance except such as despair could supply, threw themselves between the enemy and their homes, their families, and their altars. The wife fought by the side of her husband. The aged grandsire, the youth, and the tender virgin, fell in the same ranks. The scythe and the pitchfork supplied the want of the bayonet and the sword. Glorious, but unavailing efforts! Unavailing to you, brave and self-devoted Swiss! but useful to us, were we willing to profit by the lesson. Useful in teaching how fruitless is valor unaided by discipline, how little can be effected by the most exalted patriotism, the firmest union, in a nation, unless the public spirit be sustained, the public exertions systematized, combined, and directed, by a wise and vigorous Government! The catastrophe, sir, is known. Bern fell, and with her fell Switzerland; affording, in their fall, a mournful but impressive example of the mischiefs resulting from weak and versatile counsels, from party jealousy and animosities, from distrust of our own Government, and blind security as to the designs and projects of our neighbors.

This awful example, Mr. Chairman, passed under the eyes of France; and the reflections which this example furnishes, she will, she must apply to us, and to our conduct. In Switzerland she saw her views accomplished by the aid of a party, which did not intend to aid her; by the feebleness, the timidity, the divisions, and the fickleness, which the efforts of that party, guided most probably by upright though mistaken views, were able to introduce into the councils of Bern. That party, sir, was not a French party. It was not a revolutionary party. It was not even a democratic party. It called itself a peace party. It talked of the expense of defensive preparations; of the danger of irritation; of the horrors of war; of the improbability, not to say the impossibility, of an attack by France. When France sees the same measures pursued, finds the same language held, by a party here, and sees the efforts of that party so far successful as to effect a disbandment of the army at a moment like this, may she not, will she not, nay, sir, must she not expect the same final result? must not her conduct in the negotiation be guided by that expectation? She will say, "The conduct of this party, like that of the party in Bern, proceeds, perhaps, not from attachment to me, but from jealousy of their own Executive, from the spirit of opposition, from animosity against their rivals who are in power; but, from whatever cause it proceeds, its effect is to stop the Government of all means of defence, and to lay the country at my mercy." Sir, this must be her reasoning, and by it her conduct must be regulated. Elated by success in one country, she will expect it in another and that expectation will imbolden her to the attempt. Can any party be more honest than the party in Bern? Sir, I believe not. Can any people be more patriotic, more brave, more devoted in their country's cause, than the people of Switzerland? They cannot. Can our hardy mountaineers sacrifice themselves in defence of their mountains, with a courage more truly Spartan, than was displayed by the shepherds of Unterwald? Sir they cannot. Can our farmers die with more heroism in defence of their firesides and their families, than died, I will not say the men, but the women, and children of Bern and Solure? No! no! they cannot. Yet they perished. Their means were abundant, their courage was undismayed, their patriotism was ardent and pure; and yet they perished, because the efforts of a party in their Government prevented them from using those means. France found in that party a most useful ally; and, by its aid, her arts and her arms triumphed over the bravest, the most virtuous, and the truest people that Europe could boast. Sir, let the mournful, the instructive truth, be again repeated, and never forgotten; it was in the Council of Bern that the conquest of Switzerland was achieved. And it is on this floor, sir, that, from the example of Switzerland, France will expect to achieve the conquest of the United States, should she see measures like that on your table adopted.

The resolution on your table, sir, would manifest, or be considered by France as manifesting, the same weakness, the same division, the same preponderance of a party steadily opposed to every measure for resisting her encroachments and her attacks; and the success of it must give her hopes, and apparently well grounded hopes, of the same success here, which she has seen to result from a similar state of things in Switzerland. These hopes must lead to a resolution, on her part, to bend us to her will, whenever she may find it convenient to make the attempt; and in the meantime, to pass over our demands of justice with contempt, or repel them as formerly, with haughty insult.

Such, Mr. Chairman, in my apprehension, must be the effect of this resolution, if adopted, on the Government of France. What must be its effect on the conduct of our own Government? This is the question next to be considered.

I cannot suppose, sir, that gentlemen wish to place the Government of this country in such a situation, that it must feel itself deprived of the public confidence, deprived of the national support, and compelled, through a sense of weakness, to subscribe to the terms which France may choose to dictate; but such, I conceive, must be the effect of adopting this resolution. The language of this resolution to our Executive is this: "We cannot trust you with the means of defending the country. Even in case of a conflict with France, we will deprive you of those means, lest you should abuse them. Besides, we cannot afford the expense of those means. We cannot pay for an army capable of defending the country, even should it be invaded; and, therefore, you must arrest the danger, as well you can, by submission." Whatever different explanation, sir, gentlemen may give; whatever they may say about the want of motive, or the want of means, to invade us, on the part of France; whatever they may say about the all-sufficiency of a sudden effort of militia, hastily collected together, without officers, without discipline, and without the possibility of acquiring it, to defend their country against the attacks of disciplined and veteran armies; this is the plain language of their resolution; this is the manner in which all men of sense must understand it; thus it must be understood by the Executive of the United States. It must go into the negotiation with a thorough sense of its own weakness, of its abandoned state. It must find itself discouraged from demanding fair and honorable terms, precisely in the same proportion and by the same means that the Government of France is encouraged to refuse them. The tendency and perhaps the effect of this view of things, must be to strip it of all that manly energy, of that lofty magnanimous spirit, of that unshaken firmness, which are essential for the preservation of the national rights and honor, in a negotiation with such a Power as the French Republic.

Such, Mr. Chairman, in my apprehension, is the effect which this resolution, if adopted, must have on the success of our negotiation with France. What must be its effect on our situation should that negotiation fail? This is the question which next demands our consideration.

In discussing this question, gentlemen have affirmed, and made it the groundwork of their reasoning, that there can be no danger of invasion from France, even should the negotiation fail. What object, they ask, could France have for invading this country? What means has she of effecting such an enterprise were it her desire?

As to the objects for invading us, sir, I will answer that question by another. What object had the French Government in sending Bonaparte to Egypt? The object must have been conquest or plunder on the one hand, or, on the other, the desire of getting rid of a general whose talents, ambition, and influence they dreaded, or of employing, rewarding, or banishing an army whose claims they were not in a condition to satisfy, on whose obedience they could not rely, and of whose enterprising valor and attachment to their chief they were justly afraid. Some, perhaps all, of these motives must have induced them to send Bonaparte with an army of forty thousand men to invade Egypt.

Now I shall ask gentlemen whether all these motives do not exist, in a stronger degree, in our case, than in the case of Egypt? Are there, or can there be, no more enterprising armies and powerful generals whom the Government may dread, and wish to get rid of? In case of their making peace with Austria, an event very probable, will there be no more troublesome, discontented armies, whom it may be impossible to pay, and necessary to employ in distant enterprises, in order to prevent them from doing mischief at home?

Would not the plunder of America, be an object as inviting to such an army, as the plunder of Egypt? Would not the rich shores of the Savannah, the Potomac, the Chesapeake, the Delaware, and the Hudson, yield as plentiful a crop of pillage as the barren sands of the Nile? Would not Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, and Savannah, present as rich a spoil as the miserable remains of Alexandria and Cairo? Would not the conquest of America be as fine a feather in the cap of the old, or some new, Bonaparte, as the conquest of Egypt or Syria? Gentlemen say there is nothing for France to get by invading us. Sir, is the worth of our towns nothing? Would it be nothing to have the disposal of six millions of population; of our revenue; of our banks; of our shipping, amounting to upwards of 800,000 tons, exclusive of ships of war; of our immense funded capital; of fifty thousand sailors; of our ports and harbors; in fine, of the resources of this great people? Would this be nothing to France? Would it be nothing to her to be enabled to employ these resources against the commerce and settlements of the English in the West Indies, where the maritime power of that nation is susceptible of so deep and deadly a wound?

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Would it be nothing to her to gain the entire disposal of our means, as she has gained that of the means of Holland, Switzerland, Belgium, and, till very lately, of Italy.

But gentlemen say she cannot gain all this without conquering the country, and that such a conquest she cannot effect. I grant, sir, that she can never effect it; but she may hope to effect it, by the same means which she has found successful elsewhere; and that hope will be sufficient to induce the attempt where the prize is so alluring. The success of this motion would be considered by her, and with great appearance of reason, as a decisive proof of the existence, in this country, of the means which have enabled her to conquer others, and would, therefore, add new confidence to her hopes of success here. In all probability, she would not wish to effect what gentleman would call a conquest, she might not even hope it. But her purpose would be completely accomplished, by placing herself at the head of that party which she considers as favorable to her views, by aiding that party to possess itself of the Government, and then compelling it to rule according to her will. This she has done in other countries, and she will hope to do it here also. Nothing could tend more to strengthen this hope, than the success of a motion like the present. And let it be remembered, sir, that when we speak of the attempt which France may be led to make, we are to consider, not the actual probability of success, but the hope which she may entertain of success; for it is by that hope that her conduct will be regulated. Besides, sir, it is not necessary that she should hope for the conquest of that country, or even to revolutionize it in her usual way, in order to induce her to attempt an invasion. In the case of her wishing to get rid of a troublesome army, or a dangerous chief, or both, a case which probably has once happened and certainly may happen hereafter, the success of the invasion would be a very secondary consideration. The hope of plunder would allure the troops. The hope of glory would allure the leader. If conquest should result, it would be a gain to France. If the troops and the leader should be destroyed, which I have no doubt would happen, still she would gain. In one case she would extend her power; and in the other, she would rid herself of a dangerous and troublesome burden. France, therefore, Mr. Chairman, can never want an inducement to invade us. Can she want the power? I answer that she cannot.

On what do gentlemen rely, when they say that France cannot invade this country? Do they rely on her want of troops? If so, let them remember that she found forty thousand men to send to Egypt. Do they rely on her having full employment for all her troops against the Austrians and Russians? Let them remember she may suddenly make peace with the Austrians and Russians, as she did with the Austrians in 1797; that such an event grows every day more probable; and should it take place, she will have troops very fit for such an enterprise, and very ready to be employed in it. Do they rely on a want of ships? Let them remember that she found ships enough to transport forty thousand men to Egypt, and a fleet of thirteen sail-of-the-line to escort them, and that having gained possession of the Spanish fleet, she has now a much greater naval force at her disposal than heretofore. Do they rely on the superior power of the British at sea, and on the vigilance of their fleets? Let them remember that in 1797 General Hoche got out of Brest with a fleet and a considerable army, eluded two British fleets which were watching him, entered a port in Ireland, remained there several days, and after being prevented from landing by the bad weather, again eluded the British fleets, and got back to France with his fleet and his army. Let them remember that when Bonaparte sailed from the ports of France on his Egyptian expedition, he was watched by a superior British fleet, under the command of one of the ablest, most active and most enterprising naval commanders that ever England could boast; that he eluded this fleet, arrived safe at Malta, and had time to conquer that important place before the British admiral could find out where he was, and come up with him; that he sailed from Malta, and, notwithstanding this fleet was in full pursuit of him, arrived in Egypt and made good his landing, without the least molestation; that his fleet might, after landing him, have returned safe to France, had not some unaccountable fatality induced the Admiral who commanded it to remain for many days in a situation where it was exposed to the attack of the British; and that when Bonaparte had once escaped near the ports of France, from the British fleet which watched him, it was as easy for him to go down the Mediterranean, and through the Straits, to America, as up the Mediterranean to Egypt. Let them remember, in fine, that in the course of the last year, a French fleet escaped from Brest, and having eluded the British fleets that were in that quarter and near the Straits, passed into the Mediterranean; that having drawn after it the British fleets which blockaded Cadiz, and thereby enabled the Spanish fleet to follow it into the Mediterranean, it formed a junction with that fleet, escaped from the British who were in pursuit of them, repassed the Straits into the Atlantic, and returned safe to Brest, and that during the whole of this long and circuitous voyage, the French and Spanish fleets were watched and pursued by superior British fleets. Do they rely, sir, on the distance? Let them remember that when a fleet has once escaped into the open sea, the danger of meeting the enemy is almost past, and that the distance is a matter of small moment; that when the Brest fleet, having got into the Atlantic, turned to the East and went into the Mediterranean, it could as safely and as easily have turned to the West and gone into the Chesapeake; and when the two fleets had formed their junction in the Mediterranean and returned into the Atlantic, the course to New York or Charleston was as plain, and far more free from the danger of an enemy's fleet, as the course to Brest; and, in fine, that during our Revolutionary war, the French did find means, notwithstanding the distance, and the naval superiority of England, to send fleets and armies to this country.

Sir, what has been done, may be done again. It is even more easy, I affirm, and every man of reflection will concur in the opinion, to invade America than to invade Ireland; because Ireland is nearer to the British, and can more easily be watched by their fleets. There was more difficulty in going from Brest into the Mediterranean, than from Brest to America; because the British fleets could watch, and did watch, one route, but could not watch the other. When we wait for a fleet at a port from or to which it is bound, or at a cape, round which it must pass, the chance of finding it is a thousand times greater than when we search for it in the wide ocean, uncertain of its course or its final destination.

And yet gentlemen will tell us, that France has neither the means, nor the inducement to invade us; and that although our quarrel with her should continue, yet we ought to rest secure, and disband our troops. Sir, she has both the means and the inducement; and if we, by measures so weak, give her hopes of success, she will make the attempt. The use of this force is to deter her from the attempt, by showing her that we mean to resist, and to be prepared for doing so with effect. I will admit, sir, that this army might be sufficient to deter her from invading us with a great force, if she were disposed and able to do so. But we must bear in mind that a small force, an army of ten or fifteen thousand men for instance, is much more easily spared, and much more easily transported than a large one. I do believe that she will never find it convenient to send a large force here. Her want of pecuniary means, her want of ships, and the hazards of the enterprise, will very probably prevent her from making again so great an exertion, as that for the invasion of Egypt. But these circumstances would not so certainly prevent her from sending a smaller force against us, either for conquest, or plunder, or to get them out of her way. Here, then, is the first use of this army. Its first use is to prove to France that we cannot be invaded with effect, or with impunity, by a small force; that we mean to resist, and are so prepared for resistance; and by that conviction to deter her from making the attempt with a small force. Her financial embarrassments, and the state of things in Europe, will probably be sufficient to prevent her from using a great one against us, and we shall be safe. On the contrary, if we disband this army, she will consider the country as an easy, as well as a rich prey. She will suppose that we are too timid in our counsels, too much divided, too jealous of each other, and of our Government, too avaricious to make any exertions for our defence. She will suppose that ten or twelve thousand veterans, under an able leader, and with a few ships-of-the-line, will be able to insult, pillage, and distress the country with impunity; and perhaps with the aid of a party here, of whose existence, force, and views, she will consider the success of this motion as a decisive proof, to overturn the Government, revolutionize the country, and place its affairs under the control of her partisans and creatures. A prospect so alluring will probably induce her to make the attempt, as soon as she can spare a handful of troops and a few ships for the occasion. To deter her from such an attempt under such circumstances, by taking away this alluring prospect, is, let me repeat it, the first use of this army.

To enable us to resist with more promptness and more effect, if she should resolve to invade us, as she did Egypt, with greater means and more direct views, is its second use. Suppose Bonaparte, or some of his brother adventurers, to appear with forty thousand men, and thirteen sail-of-the-line, at the mouth of the Chesapeake, as he did at the mouth of the Nile, and to make good his landing. The case, sir, let it be remembered, has once happened, and may happen again. Suppose it to have happened, would the army which gentlemen propose to disband be of no use? Sir, they would be of the utmost use. Not as superseding a militia of the country, but as aiding them; as being a centre to which they might collect; as furnishing the means of giving them discipline and military knowledge. Gentlemen have chosen to treat this question, as if all who support the necessity of a regular force, or of what they, for purposes best known to themselves, choose to designate by the odious epithet of a "standing army," were desirous of disuniting and discrediting the militia. This is one of the expedients whereby popular odium is perpetually attempted to be excited, but, sir, the reputation is unfounded. We think highly of the militia, we rely much on them; we know that they are the materials out of which any efficient force for the defence of this country, in a great struggle, must be made; we have no doubt of their patriotism and courage; but we know from our own experience and that of other nations, that patriotism and courage are not enough for soldiers; that without discipline, military science, command and subordination, they are unavailing in a contest with troops possessing those advantages. The exploits of militia during the American war are often talked of. I admire them, sir, as much as anybody; but let it be remembered that those exploits were performed near the close of the war, when the militia, by frequent and long service, had acquired much of the character of regular troops; that they were performed by short and sudden efforts, which militia will readily make, and which are infinitely different from those long continued, steady exertions, those painful evolutions, those patient and tedious manœuvres whereon the success of a campaign, and of a war, almost wholly depend, and to which regular troops alone are equal; that, in fine, they were performed by small detachments, for the most part, of two, three, or four hundred men, in a sort of partisan, skirmishing war, where the want of discipline, military subordination and tactical knowledge, is infinitely less felt, and less pernicious than in large armies.

Let a man collect together any army, of even ten thousand men, where officers and privates are destitute of military habits, military knowledge, and regular subordination, and who are bound to service for only a short period of three, four, or five months, for instance; and let him attempt to make a campaign with such an army against a regular force. He will soon find its utter insufficiency. Let him double or treble the number, as in case of any great exertion, and the confusion will be increased in proportion. His troops would be brave, but they would neither be patient, nor obedient. They would be willing to fight, but unwilling to keep the field. They would not fear the enemy, but they would grow disgusted with the slowness of the operations, the toils and inconveniences of the camp, the hardships of the military life. And their general would be in perpetual danger of their abandoning him, to go home, at the very moment perhaps when the operations of the campaign were most critical and important. Nay, sir, their term of service must always expire before any great scheme of military operations would be completed.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The consequences of all this are easily foreseen, nor can they be prevented without having, at least, a considerable portion of regular troops, to give consistency to the operations, confidence to the militia, discipline to the new levies, and some degree of stability to an army, a great part of which must, from its very nature, be subject to perpetual changes.

An honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in proof of the efficiency of militia, has adduced the example of the French conscripts or requisition men, and he tells us that in case of a war in this country, we also must have recourse to requisition. If that honorable gentleman, by the term requisition, means no more than a draught of militia for that period, and according to some rule of rotation, I agree with him that we must always have such requisition, when the militia is to be called out. But if he means the French requisition, which I cannot suppose, I then answer, that the example is worthy of execration and abhorrence, not of imitation. Nay more, sir, that it never can be imitated in this country. I say that the American nation can never be forced to submit to so horrible a despotism, as that which exists in France under the name of a Republic, and enforces the requisition of that unhappy and degraded people. No, sir, while the free spirit of this nation and its ardent attachment to liberty still exists, which I hope and believe will always be the case, a French requisition can never be enforced here, even should that revolutionary state of things which some gentlemen seem to desire ever be produced. Does that honorable gentleman, sir, when he talks of a French requisition and French conscripts, and recommends them to future adoption, know what they are? I am inclined to think that he does not: Let me be permitted to inform him.

A French requisition, sir, or conscription, is neither more nor less than a British impressment, about which gentlemen sometimes declaim with such warmth, with this single exception; that, in the conscription, men of a certain age are first taken before those of a more advanced age are touched; those from eighteen to twenty-five for instance, are taken before those from twenty-five, to forty; whereas, in a British impressment, all men of a certain class, that is all seamen, are taken, whatever may be their age. With this difference, which is altogether in favor of the impressment, the two things are precisely alike. The conscript is seized by force, and if he absconds, his father, mother, and family, are answerable for his appearance. He is carried handcuffed to the army. He is put into a regular regiment, under regular officers, subject to military discipline of the strictest kind, and obliged to serve till the Government have no farther need of him. When the conscript, or the impressed seamen, once gets into the regiment, or on board of the man of war, discipline, habit, association, and the difficulty of escape, all combine with the sentiments naturally inspired by action and the sight of the enemy, to make a soldier of one, and a gallant tar of the other. This is more especially the case with the Frenchman, whose characteristic valor and military spirit are so universally known, and who is always taken at the age most susceptible of all the sentiments which ought to fire a soldier's breast.

That new levies thus selected, thus raised, and disposed of, should soon become excellent troops, is certainly nothing very wonderful. The wonder is that gentlemen should compare such troops as these to militia draughted in the mode which we practice—to a body of men called by rotation from their farms into the field, to serve for a limited and short period, and under officers chosen by themselves, as unacquainted with military matters as they are unaccustomed to service, and as impatient to return home. Sir, the conscripts of France are, to all intents and purposes, regular troops, or a standing army, if the gentlemen like the phrase better; for I contend not about names. They have all the qualities and distinguishing characteristics of regular troops. They are dispersed into old regiments, among old soldiers, under regular officers, subject to every part of military discipline, and forced to serve an unlimited time. The only difference between them and every other regular army is, that, instead of being raised by voluntary enlistment, they are raised by arbitrary impressment. Yet this is the mode of raising troops which it is said that we must imitate, and because such troops fight and conquer, we are told that we need no regular troops, even in case of war!

I must here, sir, advert to an argument advanced by my honorable friend from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) which an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) seems to have misunderstood. He has represented my honorable friend as having contended, that the force in question ought to be kept up for the purpose of overawing and curbing the discontents of the people. He is not capable of misrepresentation, but certainly he has wholly mistaken my honorable friend's meaning. Let me be permitted, sir, to state the argument as it was stated and argued by the member from Delaware. We are perpetually told that there is no need of regular forces, even in case our quarrel with France should continue, because the militia is the natural defence of the country, and a sufficient defence, on which we ought confidently to rely; and when we answer, what every man of understanding and reflection knows to be the truth, that militia, unless aided and supported by regular troops, are not to be depended on for long continued and systematic operations, we are charged, most untruly no doubt, with wanting confidence in the militia, and wishing to depreciate their merits and their services. In reply to these charges my honorable friend from Delaware adverted to the unceasing and systematic efforts which are made to inspire the people of the United States with distrust and hatred of the Administration, to imprint on their minds a belief, that the system of measures pursued by it is calculated and intended to convert the Government into a monarchy—that such is the wish, and the constant aim, of the Executive, and of all those individuals who approve and support its measures, including a majority of both Houses of Congress; finally, that the principles of the Administration, as well as its measures, are hostile to republicanism. He asked whether those efforts, being constantly repeated, and aided, as we know them to be, by every species and degree of calumny, misrepresentation, and falsehood, might not, in certain parts of the country at least, be at length successful? He asked whether the people, some portions of them at least, might not at length be induced to believe that those who administer the Government, and those who support its measures, are not engaged in a scheme for the subversion of republicanism, and the introduction of monarchy? He asked where, in such a case, would be the reliance of the Government on the efforts of the militia? Sir, the question is serious and important; and I will repeat it. Where will be the reliance of this Government on the militia for the defence of the country, if the militia, or considerable portions of them, should at length be induced, by the unceasing efforts which are employed, to regard the Government itself as their greatest enemy? Is there no danger that their efforts may be successful? Sir, I trust there is not. I have always relied on the good sense and prudence of the American people, and I have never yet been disappointed. But when we consider the greatness of the efforts, the increasing zeal with which they are renewed, the systematic form which they have assumed, and the hand whereby they are guided, can we say there is no danger of their success? Sir, I speak not of the army of libellers, pamphleteers, newswriters, and profligate scribblers, of every name and description, that is cantoned regularly through the United States, openly supported by a political party, and employed most assiduously in carrying on an attack upon the character, public and private, of all those concerned in the administration of the Government, or known to favor its principles. But shall I not speak of a letter written by a person of great name in this country, in which the people of America are informed that an “aristocratico-anglico-monarchico” faction has arisen amongst us, that this faction includes the Executive and all persons employed by it, the judges, all persons in office, of every description; in fine, that whole description of men, in Congress and out, who are known to be friendly to the administration of the Federal Government; and that the object of this party is to impose on this country the substance of the British Government? Shall

I not speak of a most virulent manifesto lately issued by a Legislature of this country against the Government of the United States, under the name of instructions, where the highest sanction is given to the vilest calumny, and the Administration is plainly charged with laboring for the introduction of monarchy? Shall I not speak of answers to addresses, in which the most scurrilous abuse and foulest slanders are poured out upon that whole class of citizens who think that the Government of the United States has been well administered; in which they are stigmatized as old Tories, apostate Whigs, British agents, speculators, and sycophants of power? Shall we say that these attempts, thus made, are always to be without success? I believe, sir, for myself, that they will. I have a strong reliance on the good sense of the nation. I believe that these attempts will share the fate of that most malignant but contemptible effort which was made some time ago, from the same quarter, to fix the odious appellation of Tory—that is, in the common acceptance, a friend to monarchy and an adherent to Britain—on the supporters and approvers of Administration, including WASHINGTON; to call WASHINGTON a Tory!—an attempt which the nation laughed to scorn, and of which its very authors at last grew ashamed. These attempts, I believe, will share a similar fate in the end. They will finally, I have little doubt, draw on their authors the contempt of the nation. But this is not certain, and if they should succeed, sir, what will be the result? Yes, sir, if these persons should at length succeed by dint of repeated calumnies in persuading the people of America, or even certain portions of them, that the Executive of the United States, the whole Administration, and a majority of both Houses of Congress, are embarked in a scheme for the gradual introduction of monarchy, and are pushing it with might and main, at every favorable opportunity, and under every plausible pretext; I ask what reliance could be had on the aid of the people, in resisting invaders who should declare, as the French never fail to do, that they come to rescue the people from oppression, to subvert aristocracy, and establish true liberty? I say, sir, and I found the opinion on the experience of every country, that such people as should be impressed with this persuasion, must join the invaders instead of opposing them. For what, sir, did the people of America formerly take up arms, and call in the French aid? It was to subvert monarchy and resist the dominion of England. Once persuade them that their own Government is a British faction and aims to introduce monarchy, and the same principle will induce them again to take up arms, and hail the approach of foreign aid. Is there no danger of their being misled? Experience, sir, answers, and says that there is danger. What produced the Western insurrection? The calumnies, misrepresentations, and inflammatory resolutions industriously circulated on the subject of the still tax. What raised the insurrection in Northampton? The falsehoods propagated, for electioneering purposes, on the subject of the house tax. The people were told that the Government of the United States wished to trample on their rights and liberties, and to establish monarchy; that a standing army had been raised for that purpose, and that the house tax was laid to support this army. This they were made to believe, and they resolved to resist the tax by force. And, sir, if one portion of the people can be brought by artifices of this kind to take up arms against the Government, might not other portions be induced, by the same artifices, to aid, instead of resisting, an invading French army? When we see these artifices practised, with increasing industry, and more extensive combination, ought we not to retain, in case our quarrel with France should continue, some force that may be more perfectly relied on?

Such, sir, was the argument of my honorable friend from Delaware; which I have been thus particular in stating, not only because it was misunderstood by the honorable member from Virginia, but because I think it worthy of most serious consideration. I do indeed trust, and believe, that these contemptible and malignant acts will, in the end, recoil on the heads of their authors; and I am firmly persuaded that in the mean time they will produce, at most, but some partial disturbances, which the patriotism and good sense of the neighboring districts will, as heretofore, put down without bloodshed or painful exertion. But, while I entertain this persuasion, still it must be admitted that there is some danger of a contrary result. Should that danger be realized, should any considerable portion of the people at length be made to regard their Government as the greatest enemy of republicanism and the public good, and of course to look with favor on an invading French army, where would be the reliance on the militia, about which we hear so much? Sir, let me repeat it, this is a most serious question.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has advanced one reason for disbanding the army, on which I must be allowed to make a remark. He has told us that in his part of the country, the very appearance of these troops excited the gall of the people. Sir, I trust that he is under a mistake. We have seen that the honorable gentleman himself has no gall. The sense of decorum and respect for himself, which we have seen him so strongly display, has indeed permitted him to bestow the harsh and unmerited epithet of ragamuffins on the army; but I am persuaded he did not mean to apply it to the whole army. Some handful of recruits, perhaps, whom the honorable gentleman has seen lately picked up in a town, and not yet clothed or drilled, may have suggested the term to his mind, and in the warmth of debate he has applied it in a manner more extensive than he intended. But even admitting that the army were ragamuffins, how could they excite the gall of the honorable gentleman's neighbors, or of himself? They ought to excite compassion, and not gall. Congress that voted them, or the Administration that had raised them, might excite gall, but as for them they did only their duty, and no part of the gall could fall on them. Instead of finding abuse and exciting gall, they would, I am persuaded, receive hospitality and kindness in the house of that honorable gentleman and his neighbors. If really in the situation of ragamuffins, they would most probably be clothed, as well as fed, should they fall in the way of the honorable gentleman and his friends. He is therefore mistaken in the fact from which he adduces a reason for the disbandment of the army. His friends from Pennsylvania and Virginia (Mr. GALLATIN and Mr. NICHOLAS) have assigned a much better reason for making the attempt at this time. They have told us that they are anxious to get the army disbanded during the pendency of the negotiation, lest, after its failure, the public spirit should be so roused and the sense of danger become so general and strong, as to render the disbandment impossible. Sir, they are in the right. If the negotiation should succeed, the army will be disbanded of course. If it should fail, I do believe that the public mind would not bear such a motion as this unnoticed. The sense of this country never would tolerate an attempt to disarm the Government in the midst of a war against France. The gentlemen therefore act wisely to make the attempt now, when there is some chance of lulling the Legislature and the country into a false security. And this, and not the gall of the honorable gentleman and his neighbors, is the true reason why the measure is pressed at this moment. The honorable mover himself, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) with a candor which I always admire in his character, has avowed the motive; and, in this instance, his prudence is equal to his candor.

Give me leave now, Mr. Chairman, to make some few concluding remarks on the financial part of this question, which has been so much dwelt on by the supporters of the motion. Much, sir, has been said of the deficit in our revenue. Much has been said of the alarming state of our finances, which, according to some gentlemen, present an appearance more alarming than has ever been exhibited by the fiscal affairs of any other nation. Last year, having occasion to prepare for war, we were forced to expend five millions more than the product of our taxes, and this sum we borrowed. Being compelled to continue those preparations till we knew the success of the negotiation with France, we shall have occasion for another loan this year, because our expenses will still exceed our revenue, while we remain in a warlike attitude. This excess gentlemen calculate very erroneously indeed, as will soon appear, at five millions for the present year; and they call it a deficit. What, they exclaim, a deficit of five millions, upon a revenue of nine! Was such a thing ever heard of before!

Sir, when gentlemen alarm themselves thus, they mistake the meaning of the word "deficit." If they will permit me, I will give them an explanation of it. The word "deficit," sir, does not mean the extraordinary expenses which a nation is forced to incur by a state of war or of preparation. These extraordinary expenses always are, and must be, far beyond the revenue of every nation. The war expenses of England, for instance, have sometimes amounted to thirty millions, when her revenue was only sixteen. The same thing, and in a much greater degree, may be said of the war expenses of France. But the word deficit, which was invented or brought into use by Mr. Neckar, applies, exclusively, to times of peace, and signifies a deficiency in the revenue from taxes, to meet the ordinary and permanent expenses of the Government. This was the deficit in the French finances, which brought on the French Revolution; and such a deficit must destroy every Government where it exists, unless it be cured by new taxes. But we, sir, have no deficit. When we were forced by the injustice of France into war preparations, we were so far from a deficit, that we had a clear surplus of a million. The moment peace is made, and we can lay down our war preparations, we shall again have a surplus, to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt which those preparations may oblige us to contract. While those preparations continue, our present taxes, with perhaps some small additions, will defray our ordinary expenses, and supply a fund for the interest of the loans which we may be compelled to make. To talk of a deficit, sir, in such a state of things, is to be guilty of an abuse of words.

Having corrected this mistake, I will now present the Committee, sir, with a short view of our expenditure and revenue for the present year, and of the amount which our war calculations compel us to provide for by a loan. As the returns are not yet complete, this statement will not be perfect. Some items will be omitted on both sides of the account, but, in the main, it may be relied on for a general result.

The interest of the old debt of every description, with the sums annually applied for its extinguishment, amounts for this year to	- - - $4,215,981
The interest on the 8 per cent. new debt, is	400,000
The expenses of the Army, Navy, and Civil List, as estimated in the late report from the Secretary of the Treasury, amount for this year, to	- - - 8,162,923
The extraordinary expenses of foreign intercourse, Indians, and Algerines	- - - 80,000
An instalment due to the bank this year	- - - 200,000
Total amount	- - - $13,078,904

To meet which we have the following revenue:

The import and tonnage duties, taken at the actual product of the last year, which was	- - - $6,400,000
The internal revenue, including the stamp duties	- - - 800,000
Certain small revenues, arising from postage, dividend of bank stock, coinage, &c.	100,000
The direct tax of two millions, the whole of which will not be collected in the course of this year, but may be brought into the Treasury by a temporary loan in anticipation, which the President is authorized to make by former laws, and which will be repaid out of the tax when collected. The whole tax may therefore be placed to the credit of this year's revenue	- - - 2,000,000 which, being deducted from the total amount of expense, ordinary and extraordinary, leaves a balance of $3,778,904, to be provided for by a loan.
Giving a total of	- - - $9,300,000

Suppose we say four millions, sir; how inconsiderable is the expense compared with the object, and with the resources of this country? The object is to defend our rights, and our national honor, which is above price; to protect our flag, and secure the fruits of their industry and enterprise to our citizens, of all classes and descriptions. What, sir, are our resources? Let us look upon our revenue from imports and tonnage, which are bottomed on the consumption of the country, and must increase progressively with that consumption. The consumption of the country in its turn must increase with the increasing population and wealth of the country. The impost and tonnage duties, therefore, may be taken as a just criterion of the augmentation of our resources. In the year 1795, those duties produced $5,500,000. In 1799, notwithstanding the immense losses which our commerce sustained from events growing out of the war, the same duties, with some small additions, by no means commensurate with the losses alluded to, produced $6,400,000. In some of the intermediate years, the product was much higher. In 1797, it rose to $7,500,000; and, as the causes which have produced a diminution since that year are of a temporary nature, it may be expected very soon to regain that height. But take the two extreme points of 1795 and 1799, and we find that in this short space, only five years inclusive, and five years of war, those duties have increased from $5,500,000, to $6,400,000, which is one fifth, or twenty per cent. on the whole amount. With a revenue increasing in this manner, and a population which, according to the best calculations, doubles itself in twenty-five years, are we, sir, to fear the incurring of a debt of a few millions for the defence of the country? When this increasing revenue, too, arises from taxes the lightest that are paid by any people on earth? Our revenue, including the direct tax, amounts to about nine and a half millions of dollars. Our population, most probably, amounts to six millions of souls, which is less than one dollar and two-thirds for each soul. The population of Great Britain may be about twelve millions of souls. Her permanent taxes, before the present tax of ten millions on income, amounted, as nearly as I can now recollect, to upwards of sixteen millions sterling; which is nearly, or quite six dollars for every soul. And yet these taxes England pays with ease, and her people are prosperous and happy. Their very ability to pay such immense taxes, with a late addition of ten millions sterling on income, and a permanent addition of two millions sterling in parish rates for the support of the poor, is an ample undeniable proof of their flourishing and happy condition. Such sums cannot be paid in a country where the people are miserable and oppressed. Despotism could not extort them, even if armed with all the apparatus of a French Revolutionary Government; for they can only be produced by a protected and prosperous industry. There are other proofs in abundance. They are to be found in the vast extent of agricultural improvement, in the increase of product from every great branch of national industry; in the immense sums expended annually on canals, and other public works of a beneficial nature.

And, with this example before us, sir, shall we say that we cannot afford money for our own defence? Sir, we never need be, and I am persuaded never shall be, taxed as the English are. A very great portion of their permanent burdens arises from the interest of a debt which the Government most unwisely suffered to accumulate almost a century, without one serious effort, or systematic plan, for its reduction. Her present Minister, at the commencement of his administration in 1783, established a permanent sinking fund, which now produces very great effects; he also introduced a maxim of infinite importance in finance, which he has steadily adhered to, that whenever a new loan is made, the means shall be provided, not only of paying the interest but of effecting a gradual extinguishment of the principal. Had these two ideas been adopted, and practised upon, at the beginning of the century which we have just seen close, England might have expended as much money as she has expended, and not owed, at this moment, a shilling of debt, except that contracted in the present war. These ideas, profiting by the example of England, we have adopted, and are now practising on. We have provided a fund, which is now in constant operation, for the extinguishment of our debt. This fund will extinguish the foreign debt in nine years from now, and the six per cent., a large part of our domestic debt, in eighteen years. I trust we shall adhere to this plan, and whenever we are compelled, by the exigency of our affairs, to make a loan, by providing also for its timely extinguishment, we may always avoid an inconvenient or burdensome accumulation of debt. We may gather all the roses of the funding system, without its thorns.

Let us suppose, sir, the worst that can happen. Let us suppose that we shall be compelled to continue our defensive preparations, and present warlike attitude, for four years longer, and to borrow in each of these years as much as we want for the present, that is four millions of dollars. This will be sixteen millions, and, added to the last year's loan, would produce a debt of twenty-one millions. Suppose, what I think hardly probable, that we should be forced to make all these loans at eight per cent. The whole amount of interest would be something less than seventeen hundred thousand dollars, and five hundred thousand dollars, as a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the debt, which that sum would effect in the course of sixteen or seventeen years; and it would produce an annual charge on the people of the United States, then increasing in population, wealth, and revenue, of two millions two hundred thousand dollars, for about sixteen years. And this would be the price at which they would buy the honor and safety of their country, the protection of their flag, and the security of their national rights! Would they grudge the price for such a purchase? Sir, I will not dishonor them by admitting the supposition.

I have gone thus far, Mr. Chairman, into the consideration of the subject in a financial view, in order to take off the false and dangerous alarm, which general declamations about the augmentation of public debt, the increase and weight of taxes, and the expense of defensive establishments, are calculated to produce. I will now close this long and I fear tedious discussion, by repeating a maxim advanced under circumstances nearly similar, in another country, by one of the greatest statesmen that has ever adorned the world—a maxim which can never be too often repeated, or too deeply impressed on the minds of those who are called to the direction of public affairs: “A nation ‘which forbears to defend itself through fear of expense, bribes its neighbors, with its own money, to attack and destroy it.’” Under the impression of this wise maxim, I cannot but flatter myself that the Committee will vote on the resolution now on your table.

When Mr. HARPER had taken his seat,

Mr. GALLATIN rose.—He said that the gentleman from South Carolina had mistaken the opinion expressed by Mr. NICHOLAS and himself. It was not that the reduction of the army would be most desirable in a state of war, but only that, as it was already provided by law that the troops should be disbanded in case the negotiation with France should succeed, the resolution on the table was peculiarly applicable to the case of a failure of negotiation. And, therefore was it, that he had given his reasons at large why those troops would be useless even in that case. The principal of those reasons was that there was no rational apprehension of an invasion. Yet the gentleman from South Carolina, drawing his own deductions from a supposed opinion of his own creation, had gone so far as to suppose that we would also avow similar sentiments even in case of an actual invasion. The whole of the superstructure which he has erected on that false foundation must fall with the foundation itself.

The gentleman from South Carolina supposes that this motion will encourage the French to attempt an invasion; and, in order to support that opinion, he insisted much on the knowledge which France had acquired of our means and resources. She is said to have derived that knowledge from her experience during the last war, from the publicity of our financial and other statements, and from the correct observations made by her agents in this country, particularly by that one who till very lately was an influential member of her own Government, (Mr. Talleyrand.) Yet all the arguments and positions of the gentleman tend to show the extent of our resources. If those positions are true, and the information of France as correct as he supposes it to be, it is impossible to believe that that nation should draw an inference from the disbanding of this army, that we are unable to support it. They will, if, as the gentleman supposes, their information is perfectly correct, view this measure, as we consider it ourselves, as a question of internal policy and economy. They will conclude that we reduce the establishment because we do not fear an invasion, and wish not to be at an useless expense.

But it is said that France will ascribe the motion to motives different from those we avow, different from those which actuate us; that it will evince the existence of a party that wishes to trammel and debilitate our own Government; that it will actually weaken the means of our Government to obtain honorable terms of accommodation, and compel the Administration to submit to any conditions France may please to impose.

Are we then to take for our guide, on subjects of legislation, the opinion which foreign nations may form of our motives, instead of being governed by the intrinsic merits of the question itself on which we are called to decide? But this motion is calculated neither to debilitate our own Government, nor to impress on France an opinion of imbecility in our councils or of internal weakness.

Different opinions are entertained as to the motives which have induced France to show a disposition to treat with us on equal terms. That disposition has by some gentlemen been ascribed solely to the spirit of resistance evinced by America, and to the state of hostility adopted by the last Congress. Was I to hazard an opinion on that subject, I would say, that the refusal of our Envoys to accede to the terms first proposed by France, a public loan and a private bribe, and the subsequent determination not to treat through the medium of a Minister selected out of the three by the Government of that country, a determination adopted by that Minister himself, contributed to produce a change on their part. I would even add, that, from Mr. Gerry's correspondence, it appears probable to me that that refusal and that determination alone would have been sufficient to produce the present negotiation. But I consider that discussion as unconnected with the motion now under consideration; and I am willing to grant at present, for the sake of argument, that the present state of things has been solely produced by the system of resistance and hostility adopted by America. And on that ground I say that the reduction of the Military Establishment can neither change the amicable disposition of France, nor deprive our Government of the means of obtaining equally advantageous and honorable terms.

The present negotiation originated in the indirect communications that took place in August, 1798, between the French Government and our Minister in Holland, and in the consequent nomination of that gentleman in February last, to treat with that Government. This additional army was voted in July, 1798. That vote could not be known in France in August, when the communications of that country, which are the acknowledged basis of the negotiation, were made. That vote, therefore, did not influence the change of disposition in France, whatever effect might have been produced by our other acts; and the repeal of that law cannot alter that disposition to treat which was not produced by the law.

As it regards our own Government, when they agreed to open a negotiation by the nomination of a Minister in February last, the army, voted six months before, existed that moment only on paper: it had, in fact, no existence. The disbanding of that army tends not, therefore, to debilitate our Government, by depriving them of any means to render a negotiation successful, which they did actually possess when they consented to open that negotiation.

There is, on the contrary, but one circumstance that can produce abroad an unfavorable impression of our situation; it is the state of our finances; it is the knowledge that our revenue does not exceed nine millions of dollars, and our expenditure amounts to fourteen. Men and free men we have, and we never, therefore, can want soldiers to repel an invading foe. But our moneyed resources are limited, and the only source of danger to us is our consuming those resources for useless objects and exhausting ourselves for the fear of imaginary dangers. And I would ask, added Mr. G., which situation is best calculated to impress foreign nations with an idea of our strength and wisdom—an annual expenditure reduced to the level of our revenue, without this army, or a deficiency of five millions, and this army, without any means of paying it but ruinous loans?

That trite topic of the necessity of certain measures, because they are called measures of defence; that cry of alarm that we are, or will be considered as a divided people; these charges of party spirit, disorganization, and jacobinism, have, for a long time, been uniformly repeated on this floor upon almost every subject of any importance. They have not not been confined to debates upon taxes, navies, or armies. The sedition and alien laws were also proposed and have since been supported as an indispensable measure of defence; those who opposed them were branded with the appellation of enemies of their Government, and the fate of the conquered countries in Europe held up to our view as a warning of the approaching danger. It is true that the burden of the song is now somewhat altered. Formerly it was Venice that was the constant subject of the lamentations of some gentlemen. With the fate of Venice we were perpetually threatened. At present Venice seems to have altogether escaped the recollection of those gentlemen. We hear not a single voice raised to remind us of the fate of Venice. Indeed, sir, I hear no more of Venice in Europe than on this floor. We are yet to learn, that since the whole of the possessions of that Republic have been wrested from the rapacious hands of the Emperor of Germany, he has restored to her her ancient independence. Is it then because the conqueror is not the same, and because the charge of ambition and rapacity is transferred from one Power to another, that gentlemen have become silent on that subject? For myself, I sincerely believe that all the great Powers of Europe, France as well as Austria, Prussia, England, or Russia, and these as well as France, are actuated by similar motives, and have similar objects in view. I can see no sensible difference between the overthrow of Tip-poo Saib, the division of Poland, or the annexation of Venice, and the conquest of Holland, Egypt, or Switzerland. Inordinate ambition and insatiable avarice equally govern them all, and they seem equally to disregard the dictates of justice and integrity. These are the exclusive attributes of the weaker European nations, and seem to have no better foundation than their weakness.

We were, however, very seriously admonished, on this occasion, with the destiny of Holland. As the opposition to the motion is, in a great degree, grounded on the supposed inefficacy of a militia and the necessity of a standing army in case of invasion, the instance of Holland, who had no militia, and who was conquered notwithstanding her standing army, is not certainly very judiciously selected by the opponents of the motion. Their object, however, is to insinuate that our political divisions may prove as fatal as those of Holland. Yet no evidence has ever been adduced to convince us that the patriots of that country assisted the French in their invasion. It appears that the mass of the people there, whatever might have been their former sentiments, have, during this war, been the passive prey of their successive defenders or conquerors. But there does not exist the least similarity between the parties of this country and those of Holland. Here men, perfectly equal in their rights and expectations, differ about the propriety of measures adopted or rejected by a majority, and that majority fluctuates with the opinions of the people expressed in their elections. Here men differ on the measures and not on the form of the Government. Here we have no influential family, possessed of an immense hereditary power, supported by one half and detested by the other half of the nation. In Holland, civil dissensions and wars on the subject of the Orange family, have been almost coeval with the existence of the Republic. The Stadtholdership has been abolished and reinstated six times before the present war. The present Prince of Orange was, some time before the French Revolution, expelled by a majority of the people of Holland, unaided by foreign aid; and he was within a short time reinstated, against their will, by the armies of the King of Prussia. Doubtless a people governed by a sovereign who had, but a few years before, been imposed upon them by a foreign Power, could not be supposed to exert much energy in his defence. But, if for that reason they afford inducements of invasion to France, can any inference be drawn applicable to America? Unless the gentlemen suppose that our Government was imposed on the people of America, against the will of a majority and by force, or unless they suppose the existence in this country of a party who wish to subvert our Government and to establish here an hereditary Stadtholder, they must acknowledge the fallacy of these inferences.

Any comparison between Egypt and the United States would be so evidently absurd that it would be wasting the time of the Committee to dwell on the subject. But Switzerland has been mentioned. An appeal to the opinion of a member of this House, personally acquainted with that country, has been made by the gentleman from South Carolina. I believe, said Mr. G., that I am the only member who may be supposed to possess some personal knowledge of Switzerland; I have indeed, principally on account of that appeal, been induced to reply to the gentleman; and although I do believe that it is not altogether fair to draw any arguments from opinions of a member of this body, which have never certainly been declared on this floor, and which must therefore have been expressed in a loose manner and in private conversation, I will beg the indulgence of the Committee whilst I state the facts alluded to, so far as I am acquainted with them.

The population of Switzerland is estimated at less than two millions of souls, and the Canton of Bern includes about one third of the whole. Less than 400,000 souls form the population of that part of the Canton called the "German country." Between two and three hundred thousand inhabit that part called "Pays de Vaud," which was conquered by Bern from the house of Savoy. The Government of that Canton was monstrous in theory, but gentle and it may be good in its administration. Out of two hundred families, and to the exclusion of all the other citizens, a council of two hundred and fifty was selected for life, filling their own vacancies out of those families only, and uniting the supreme legislative, executive, and even judiciary powers. It was a complete hereditary aristocracy. Yet the people were protected in their property, justice was administered with tolerable impartiality, individual acts of oppression were rare, taxes were light; the administration on the whole might perhaps deserve the appellation of paternal: even the conquered inhabitants of Pays de Vaud, although subjects in the true meaning of the word, could boast that they lived under the most gentle servitude. The people of the whole canton enjoyed a greater share of physical happiness than those of any other European nation; and the only rational cause of discontent was the hereditary, insuperable exclusion from any share in the government of that nominal republic of which they were nominal citizens. The causes of so much real happiness, under a form of government so little calculated to bestow it, are worthy of attention, and not altogether inapplicable to the present question.

In the first place, that canton, together with the other parts of Switzerland, had enjoyed two centuries of peace. Firmly attached to a system of neutrality, and having neither armies nor other expensive establishments, light taxes and a frugal economy enabled them to support the necessary expenses of Government, and even to enrich the individual members of that Government, and to accumulate a public treasure, without having recourse to any extended system of taxation, much less to a system of accumulating funded debt. This was the first cause of the happiness of the body of the people. Their Government kept clear of foreign wars, supported no army, and was not under the necessity of wresting the fruits of the labor of the governed, in order to support the expense and parade of a military, unproductive establishment. But, as they had no military standing force, the defence of the country rested with the people themselves. Hence, every man was armed and trained to arms. The people were the best, indeed the only militia of Europe. And this was their best security against oppression. The existence of an arbitrary Government, destitute of military standing force, depended on the will of its armed subjects; and this accounts for the great moderation and gentle administration of that Government.

Of the other parts of Switzerland, it will be sufficient to say that they consisted of a number of small independent republics, feebly united by any general government, some of them governed by aristocracies as vicious in practice as in theory, and others enjoying perfectly free governments.

I would not have presumed, said Mr. G., to state so much at large mere historical facts, as well known to almost every member of this Committee as to myself, had I not been drawn into that digression by the historical details given to us by the gentleman from South Carolina, and I must once more apologise for having consumed in that manner so much of their time. But what deductions can be drawn from those facts connected with the event of the invasion and conquest of that country? When that invasion took place, the subjects of most of those aristocracies, except that of Bern and a considerable part of the inhabitants of the Pays de Vaud, either joined or did not resist the French. The citizens of the free cantons, and even those of the Canton of Bern, made every resistance in their power, and were subdued merely by a superior force. No inference can thence be drawn except that the subjects of a Government, bad in practice and theory, may wish for a revolution or for a change of masters; and that the citizens of a free country, and even the subjects of a Government bad in theory, but gentle in its administration, may safely be trusted with the defence of their country against an invading foe. Want of success was not owing to the want of exertions, but to immense inferiority of power. As to the divisions of the councils of Bern so much insisted on by the gentleman from South Carolina, they had not the least effect on the event. When those divisions he alluded to took place, the event was decided; the enemy was at the gates. The smallness of the population has been mentioned. No hope of success remained, and the only division at that time was on the question whether it was proper to sacrifice or preserve the lives of a handful of enthusiastic and devoted people. Unfortunately, indeed, divisions had previously existed in those councils. In 1792, when the Duke of Brunswick invaded France, and perhaps at other subsequent times, when the alarm was proclaimed that the French Revolution endangered every Government, a party in the Council of Bern favored the views of the coalition, and although they could not obtain a majority in favor of war, a departure from the ancient strict rules of neutrality occasionally took place, which afforded afterwards, when the favorable moment of a suspension of war with Germany took place, a pretence to the unjustifiable invasion of France.

France, it is true, has been enabled to conquer, by superior numbers, a small country lying at her doors, and whose immense importance to her as a military position, in her approaching contest with the Continental Powers, has been evinced by the state of this campaign. It would be ridiculous to dwell on the immense difference resulting in favor of America, from her distance, extent of territory, population, union, and Government.

Before he would take leave of these extraneous historical digressions, Mr. G. said, that he could not help noticing one of the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina. That gentleman had remarked, that the French conscripts, carried as he said by force and chained to the army, fought with uncommon bravery against a foreign enemy. Thus it appeared that Frenchmen living under the worst tyranny, even that of Robespierre, and at a time when their country was torn by the most inveterate and bloody internal factions, did not hesitate, although dragged in chains to a camp, to fight, and had succeeded in repelling an invading foe and even in prosecuting war in foreign countries. Why did not the gentleman apply that instance also, and draw its proper deduction as applied to America? If the French people in that situation, and amidst those divisions, had been found equal to the task of combatting foreign nations, could it be supposed that the free citizens of America would, on account of some divisions merely of opinion, be less willing and less capable to defend themselves and their independence at the time of real danger against a foreign invader?

The arguments given in support of the possibility of an invasion were not certainly susceptible of being absolutely disproved by reasoning. They were grounded not on probabilities, but on possible events. And there was perhaps nothing which could be proved to be altogether impossible. But that kind of argument did not apply, particularly to the present motion or to the present time. For there could be no possible time, nor any possible situation of Europe, which would not justify some hypothetic statement as plausible as that given by the gentleman from South Carolina. At any time, and under any circumstances whatever, that gentleman, or any other, might assert that it was not altogether impossible for some European nation to attempt an invasion of this country, and, on as solid ground, justify a permanent military establishment of considerable magnitude. The suppositions of that gentleman, if they would prove anything, would only prove that it was necessary for America, at all times, and as a measure of caution, to keep on foot a large standing army. They only would prove that this army ought not to be disbanded even if the negotiation with France should succeed.

Amongst other inducements which we offered to invasion, that gentleman had, however, mentioned one of an extraordinary nature. In his enumeration of the objects of plunder, which might attract French rapacity, he counted our funded capital. As our funded capital is the same thing with our funded debt, I must confess for my share, said Mr. G., that I have no objection to give it to the French or to any other nation that will take it. It would be the most negative gift ever bestowed by one Government on another.

The gentleman from South Carolina had indulged himself in a number of observations on a supposed party, whose views he had represented at one time to be to carry elections by means of insurrections, at another to estrange the people from their Government. He seemed indeed to have altogether confounded evidences of dissatisfaction at certain measures of Administration with a decided hatred against a Government of their own choice. But he had concluded his observation by an unexpected conclusion. For, after having stated the strength of that party as extremely formidable—since he had drawn proof of its existence from the legislative proceedings of some large and respectable State, from the declarations of the Governor of another powerful State, and even from the supposed opinions of the second official character of the Union—after having represented their views as extremely dangerous, not less indeed than to persuade the militia, the people of this country, that they should consider French invaders as their deliverers—he told us that they were too weak in numbers, and too contemptible to be considered as in any degree dangerous. Did I believe the reality of all the positions of that gentleman, relative to party, I must confess that I would not consider that party as too contemptible to create any danger. And if he did believe they were so harmless, to what purpose did he expatiate so much at large on their existence and designs? But the gentleman from Delaware views this subject in a different light. His conclusion was, that, knowing the existence of such a party, it was necessary to have an army, in order to defend this country against an invasion, inasmuch as a considerable part of the militia could not be trusted with its defence.

If a party does exist so inimical to our Government as to join an invading enemy, in order to subvert it, they must be supposed to subvert it without an invasion. It is impossible to mistake the meaning of the gentlemen. When they ground the necessity of an army on the supposed existence of a party, let them express themselves as they please, either they mean nothing, or they mean that an army is necessary not only against an enemy, but against a party of the people. Let the gentlemen be silent about party, or let them candidly acknowledge that this army is intended to suppress party.

Mr. G. then proceeded to make some observations on the financial statements of the gentleman from South Carolina. He said he had avoided making any detailed statement of that kind, because he knew that the official documents, necessary to form a correct estimate, were not yet before the House. And he had stated, in the gross, that our revenue was about nine millions, our expenditure about fourteen, and the deficiency therefore about five. The result of the gentleman from South Carolina was to show a deficiency of only four millions. It was immaterial to the present question whether that deficiency was four or five millions. But the details on which the gentleman from South Carolina had grounded his result were in some degree incorrect. He had estimated the nett proceeds of the land tax at two millions of dollars. But he had forgotten to deduct from that sum the expenses of collection, which, being $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., would amount to \$115,000. He had stated, what was true, that the whole of the nett proceeds of that tax could not be received in the Treasury during the present year. Yet he insisted that the whole amount should be considered as part of those receipts, because an anticipation for the deficiency might be obtained by way of loan, from the Bank. That anticipation certainly could not be considered as part of the receipts arising from revenue. Instead of being credited to the account of revenue, it ought to be charged as part of the debt that would be contracted during the present year. An anticipation was as much a debt as any other loan. The amount of that anticipation would fill a part of the deficiency and should be added to the amount of five millions, stated as deficiencies by the gentleman. He had also neglected to insert several items in his estimate of expenditures; the most important omission was the necessary disbursements for the building of the seventy-fours, which, by the Secretary of the Treasury, were estimated at \$1,300,000.

The deficiency is, however, acknowledged to be at least four millions; making only these few corrections to the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina, it appears to be five millions. Our revenue is stated by all of us to be only nine millions; and under those circumstances, Mr. G. said, he would ask, whether a saving of two millions and a half, which would result from the adoption of the motion, would be called contemptible? But we are flattered by expectations of an increasing revenue, even without additional taxes. The very reverse, a diminution, instead of an increase, appears probable. The gentleman from South Carolina has compared the proceeds of the impost of 1795 with those of 1799, in order to prove an increase. But he forgot to state how much was due to a real increase of importation, and how much to an increase of taxation. The fact was, that the rate of duty on many articles had been considerably increased in 1796 and 1797, and that an additional duty on salt had been laid in 1798, all of which were blended together in his statements. But the right way of computation would have been to compare the proceeds of the impost for 1799 with those of 1798 and 1797; and that comparison would show a defalcation in 1799 of near eight hundred thousand dollars from the average proceeds of 1797 and 1798; for those two years had given $14,400,000 for the impost and tonnage, equal to an average of $7,200,000, and the year 1799 had given less than $6,500,000. Was there any probability, from the importations of last Fall as compared with those of the preceding years, that the amount of impost for 1800 would exceed the amount of 1799? We import in proportion to our consumption, which must be limited by our means of payment. Those means of payment are always in proportion to our exports, and an examination of these will show that the quantities of articles of our own produce have not increased, but, on the whole, have rather suffered a decrease within these past few years. It is solely to the increase of the price in most of the articles, that we are indebted for any increase in the value of that of our exports, which consist of articles of our own produce. The prodigious fall of seven dollars at least per hundred, in the price of tobacco, will make a difference of several millions of dollars in the value of our exports, will so far diminish our means of payment for articles imported, and will so far tend to diminish our importations and affect our revenue.

We are, however, told that any increase of debt that may be created in consequence of our present situation is trifling in itself, and holds no proportion to the supposed increase of resources resulting from our growing population. But the gentlemen from Massachusetts (Mr. OTIS) and from South Carolina (Mr. HARPER) estimate that possible increase at something more than twenty millions of dollars, which would require, according to the calculation of one of those gentlemen, additional taxes to the amount of two millions, in order to pay the interest on and redeem the principal itself in twenty years. Whether to add twenty five per cent. to our debt and taxes can be considered as trifling, Mr. G. said, he would leave the Committee to judge? But was it not a most extraordinary and novel mode of calculating, not on the present resources of the country, but on those which posterity might have? Are we then so sure that our posterity will have no dangers of their own to encounter, and no additional expenditures which will require every additional resource they may possess? Let us provide, out of our own resources, for our own wants, instead of mortgaging not only our actual revenue, but even that which may hereafter be raised by posterity.

Much has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina of certain new financial discoveries, relative to the application of a sinking fund, which had they been known to British Ministers fifty or one hundred years ago, as well as they were to the present Administration of that country, would have discharged, by this time, the whole debt of Great Britain. Were we to judge of the merit of that pretended new application of a sinking fund by its effects, we would not be disposed to admire it as much as the gentleman. Seventeen years ago, the debt of Great Britain did not exceed two hundred and forty millions sterling. During that period, that country had enjoyed ten years of peace, and had seven years of war; during that period, the years of war did not exceed the average proportion of time for which England had been involved in war for the last fifty years. At present her debt was almost five hundred millions sterling. The present Administration of Great Britain, notwithstanding all the boasted merit of certain modifications of the sinking fund, had more than doubled the public debt during that period.

I know, said Mr. G., but one way that a nation has of paying her debts; and that is precisely the same which individuals practise. "Spend less than you receive;" and you may then apply the surplus of your receipts to the discharge of your debts. But if you spend more than you receive, you may have recourse to sinking funds, you may modify them as you please, you may render your accounts extremely complex, you may give a scientific appearance to additions and subtractions; you must still necessarily increase your debt. If you spend more than you receive, the difference must be supplied by loans; and if out of these receipts you have set a sum apart to pay your debts—if you have so mortgaged or disposed of that sum that you cannot apply it to your useful expenditure, you must borrow so much more in order to meet your expenditure. If your revenue is nine millions of dollars, and your expenditure fourteen, you must borrow, you must create a new debt of five millions. But if two millions of that revenue are, under the name of sinking fund, applicable to the payment of the principal of an old debt, and pledged for it, then the portion of your revenue applicable to discharging your current expenditures of fourteen millions is reduced to seven millions; and instead of borrowing five millions, you must borrow seven: you create a new debt of seven millions, and you pay an old one of two. It is still the same increase of five millions of debt. The only difference that is produced arises from the relative price you give for the old debt and rate of interest you pay for the new. At present we pay yearly, a part of a domestic debt, bearing six per cent. interest, and of a foreign debt bearing four or five per cent. interest; and we may pay both of them at par. At the same time we are obliged to borrow at the rate of eight per cent. At present, therefore, that nominal sinking fund increases our debt, or at least the annual interest payable on our debt.

Mr. G. said, he would now conclude the desultory observations into which he had been drawn, from a wish to reply to some parts of the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina. It was true, indeed, those observations could have no weight with gentlemen who supposed the liberty and independence of the country concerned in the reduction of the Military Establishment. To him it was only a question of economy, which could have no possible effect on the external relations of America, which had no importance except as a question of economy. But, as such, he considered it as highly important, and hoped it might be viewed in the same light by the Committee.

Mr. H. LEE.—If, Mr. Speaker, search after truth was sincerely pursued in debate, we should be relieved from much useless discussion, much unnecessary consumption of our time, and the common good would be more thoroughly promoted. But it seems as if long habit in public speaking produced a desire rather to give some colorable pretexts for favorite opinions, however erroneous, than by open and manly arguments to enlighten and convince. Much as we have cause to lament the prevalence of this habit, it must be endured, and can be corrected only by sound decisions in those whose province it is to decide.

The gentleman last up (Mr. GALLATIN) has started with a fundamental error, which has diffused its influence through his whole argument. To have regarded the turn of his discourse you would suppose that the question before us was the creation of a permanent military force, when in truth it is whether we shall disband a part of a force already created, or, in other words, whether we shall disband a considerable portion of the army raised for the express purpose of defending the United States from an unprovoked existing war waged against us by France, before we know what may be the termination of our third attempt to secure to us a solid peace. We contend that prudence, dignity, and economy, alike command us to make no diminution in our actual force, till the result of the existing negotiation is ascertained. I put it to the candor of the honorable gentleman last up, whether this is not the real question. But the course of debate has obscured if not changed the point in dispute, and the attention of the Committee has been drawn to objects opposite or irrelevant.

JANUARY, 1800.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

If the real question be that now stated, I ask on what ground can gentlemen hesitate in their decision? In three months we shall know whether the enemy conclude a peace, or continue war. In the first event the army falls of course, in the last event their services may be wanting. The intermediate expense will not be more than $130,000, and shall we, to avoid this small expense, properly styled "contemptible" by the gentleman himself, deprive our country of the means of self-defence acquired by a large expenditure of our money?

On the score of economy only, I repeat my assertion, the measure ought to be rejected. But says the honorable gentleman, we believe the negotiation for peace will fail and then we have no doubt the army will be held in service, and a useless expense of two millions and a half of dollars thus incurred. To prevent this, we now urge its reduction.

It is not possible to declare the situation of things should the negotiation fail—therefore it is not possible to say now what it may be proper to do in case of such failure—the conduct to be observed must be decided by the existing circumstances of the period. But I hesitate not in pronouncing it as my opinion, that if the public interest shall require a reduction, or even a disbandment of the army, negotiation failing, such reduction or disbandment will be made; the happiness of the people would command the measure, and their happiness is the sole object of the exertions of those gentlemen with whom he had the pleasure of acting on this floor, as well as of every other department of Government, so far as it was in his power to distinguish their views. Was it reduced to a certainty that the pending negotiation would terminate in a solid peace, I should with alacrity support the motion on the table, for upon all occasions it is our duty to save the public money, unless by such saving we sacrifice more important interests. But the event of the negotiation is unknown; I must, therefore, continue to resist every measure which in this state of incertitude tends to decrease our actual force, or to brand with the stamp of caprice our public councils. I persuade myself, that some days ago, it was clearly shown that the army to which the motion applies was part of the general system of defence adopted on the part of the United States, in consequence of French aggression, and indeed that this fact was established from evidence exhibited by the gentleman last up. To make any change in that system at this time I persist in believing not only unwarranted by sound policy, but as begetting impressions unfavorable to our national character, and tending to disappoint our hopes of peace.

The gentleman thought it extremely improper in our deliberations to respect at all the influence which our conduct might have on the councils and conduct of any other nation, but contended that every measure ought to be tried by its own intrinsic merit. I differ entirely in opinion from the honorable member. In my judgment, no consideration is more proper than the effect of our measures on the conduct of the nation to whom such measures apply. I know no other test by which the merit or demerit of our deliberations can be so fairly ascertained; thus we act in private life, and thus do and must all nations act. By what other light ought we, or can we direct our steps? But it seems, we not only ought to disregard the influence of our measures on our present foe, but must shut out, too, from our deliberations, all the instruction which history affords.

The learned and relevant researches which the honorable member from South Carolina edified us with, have drawn upon him, from the gentleman last up, unmerited asperity. Very differently indeed, sir, did my mind feel under the instructive illustration. I feel the propriety of holding up to the view of America, the fall of Venice, of Holland, of humble, but once happy Switzerland. The example of other nations ought, and I hope will teach us to avoid similar destruction, by adopting in time different conduct. In what manner can you so strongly appeal to the good sense of your own countrymen, as by showing to them from the faithful page of history how to avoid national disasters?

If, Mr. Chairman, we are neither to regard the effect of our measures on those on whom they are intended to operate, nor to look into history for light to guide our deliberations, we act the part of mere puppets, spending to no possible good purpose the people's money, and exhibiting to the world a splendid instance of human insignificance. Fortunately for the American nation and for the human race, such barbarous doctrines cannot be admitted. History will be referred to by those who direct public councils, and time, in its guidance, will uphold human happiness, by enlightening human councils. I thank the member from South Carolina, for his applicable and illustrating information, confirmed not only in the instance he has quoted, but by all ancient history, and especially in the conquest of Greece, by Philip of Macedon.

How then results this historical inquiry? Certainly, that the United States, warned by the fall of other nations, ought to hold fast all her acquired means of defence, till the establishment of a solid peace shall authorize her with safety to save her money by reducing her expenses.

But the same member has been pleased to acknowledge that the system of defence had produced a change of conduct on the part of France, but attributes this change to our diplomatic efforts and naval exertions. I agree with him in part; the ability displayed by our late Envoys, and the vigilance of our infant navy, no doubt contributed to produce the change alluded to, so did also the raising of an additional military force, and the other defensive measures adopted by Congress.

It has again and again been represented that we place our whole confidence for the defence of our country, in case of invasion, in these ten or twelve thousand men, although we have often denied it. We have again and again declared that we consider a well disciplined militia to be the chief bulwark of our nation, but have insisted on the impropriety of trusting to militia only in actual war. A regular army, adequate to the object of co-operating with the militia, we prefer as the safest and cheapest defence. Let us then be quoted fairly, let the truth only be disseminated, and I cheerfully will meet all the consequences of the opinion given.

The honorable gentleman has attempted to do away all the operation of the illustration which fell from the gentleman from South Carolina, so far as it grew out of difference of opinion existing in this country, by asserting that although the Hollanders did experience much evil from their internal discord, yet the same evils were not to be apprehended from our differences of opinion. We had no Stadtholder, nor did we assimilate in any respect the condition of the people of Holland. It is true we have no Stadtholder, nor is our situation as a people much like that of Holland, but we are men, we are governed by the appetites and passions common to men, and we must expect the same effect from the same causes; unless, as was correctly expressed by an ingenious young member the other day, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) the operation of physical and moral causes and effects was suspended in America. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, and I acknowledge it with much pain, that our differences in America are the same as to principle and operation as are the differences referred to, and the extent of the effect will depend on the good sense of the people. For my own part I sincerely wish they would rid the public councils of all factious men. Thus and thus only can the evil be arrested.

Difference of opinion, sir, backed by possession of power, no matter how named or how dressed, will lead always to disastrous consequences, if successfully fostered by an erring people or by the intrigues of a foreign nation. This truth the honorable member would find fully exhibited in that invaluable book written by the illustrious personage at the head of our Government, and which work in my humble opinion stands first in all the efforts of science to secure and perpetuate the blessings of liberty to man, notwithstanding the misconceived and unmerited censure which now surrounds it.

It is in vain for gentlemen to treat so indifferently the existing difference of opinion among us, their own experience meets them full in the face.

When that great and good man whose picture hangs before us, conducted the Government, what was the trial to which he was subjected with a foreign agent! How difficult did he find it, with all the greatness of his character, to repress the intrigues of that foreign agent! Did not a difference of opinion, ranged in conformity with existing differences of opinion, pervade the continent? Were there not found many citizens who openly maintained the proceedings of the foreign Minister in opposition to their own Chief Magistrate? How then can gentlemen affect to disbelieve that the people of America are liable, like other nations, to all the disasters which spring from factions and factious men?

The gentleman is certainly correct when he says that powerful nations consult too often their own will and not the rules of right, nor can the truth of the position be more precisely maintained than by the example of that very nation now at war with us. Austria and Great Britain, powerful nations, I dare say have also often proved the correctness of the gentleman's opinion; but it does not follow that because these two nations do wrong, that therefore we ought to submit to injuries received from France. My own opinion is that America ought to guard herself against injury from all nations, disregarding their name or situation. I wish, said Mr. L., we could conduct our affairs without having anything to do with the Ministers of foreign nations, we should then be exempt from the influence of their intrigues; but this is impossible, and of course, the only course to be pursued is to counteract their operation as much as possible, by guarding against the effect. But it is not the way to guard ourselves by declaring, with the same gentleman, that they can do us no injury. I lament very much that the debate has taken this turn, but it was not possible to avoid it, without shrinking from that full inquiry demanded by the occasion.

It has been more than once insinuated that the army is preserved with a view to turn their arms on a part of the people who differ in sentiment from Administration. Is it possible that such an opinion can be entertained? What evidence can be resorted to in justification of such a sentiment? Ought it to have been ventured without full proof to support it? Can any insinuation be more cruel or absurd? An Administration uniformly distinguished by love of country, by zeal for the common happiness, by vigilance and wisdom in the execution of its duty, and by an enlarged and correct arrangement of all the affairs of the nation, surely deserves very different treatment. I must therefore say, what I utter with reluctance, that these derogating suspicions must have been experienced in the breast of the member who announced them.

Much has been said on the subject of money and the saving of money. But it has not been proved on the present occasion that the small retrenchment contended for would ultimately turn out a saving of money—the reverse was most probable. It was the duty of every man in that House to be careful of the public money, and, as far as his small experience justified any opinion, no Legislature could be more attentive to this subject than the House of Representatives. Let us proceed in the same praiseworthy manner, but let us not prefer saving the people's money to securing their liberty and their lives. For my own part, I never considered the present subject as involving much pecuniary consequence, and therefore have been surprised to find gentlemen in opposition always recurring to this ground.

Another topic sensible in its effect on the eloquence of the friends to the motion, and a never failing topic, is the militia; and, to show their entire capacity to defend the country, various instances have been cited of their valor in the American revolutionary war. It is certainly grateful to the American ear to hear eulogiums pronounced on our countrymen, and no heart rejoices more than does mine in recollecting the gallantry of our militia. The two examples quoted, Bunker's Hill and King's Mountain, are illustrious proofs of American valor, and grateful America has always manifested her deep regard of those highly honored defenders of their country. Was it necessary, we could add many other memorable testimonies of the occasional and gallant services of our militia during the late war, but it is unnecessary and will be avoided. For, although true, it does not change the position we contend for. The mere act of fighting is not the whole of soldiership. The militia equal any troops in personal courage and exceed all in fidelity. They want method, patience, obedience, and combination, without all which attributes, no man can be a good soldier. Sir, without these qualifications, essential to war, never expect a long course of success. The trained man does possess them, and therefore will forever be superior to the untrained man. You must, therefore, when you prepare for war, create a trained army. We want no mercenary nor foreign army—we want our own brothers, our own sons, taught to be patient, to obey, to retreat, to act in concert, and thus in the hour of battle to be equal to their enemy, however skilful. Show me, in any country, where militia have so done, until beaten into it by long and constant course of service. It cannot be done.

He was sorry his honorable colleague had used the word mercenary; it certainly was not justly applied to our army—an army of foreigners fighting for her only was so designated with propriety. But really he could never admit the justice of the appellation when applied to an army of natives, interested in common with us all as to country and objects, and distinguished from us only by the receipt of pay. If this last distinction authorized the expression, it might be applied to our militia; they receive pay when in service. The King's Mountain action is no proof of the counter opinion. An imprudent though gallant officer had placed himself far from all possible support and in the neighborhood of a country entirely inimical. He was caught on the top of a mountain, hid as it were like a squirrel. Surrounded by brave militia, expert in the use of rifles, his fate was inevitable. But suppose he could have entrenched himself and had been in possession of a fortnight's supply of provisions; do you believe he would have been taken? No, the event would not have happened; brave as were the assailants they were militia, they would have been found destitute of patience, and thus the enemy would have escaped. I say not this to subtract from the credit due to these gallant and patriotic citizens. No man more reveres their heroism, but I make the explanation that my country, knowing the truth, may repel the introduction of error.

But it seems we are to have militia like the conscripts of France. If you effect this, your militia will be regulars—for the name conscript and the name regular means one and the same thing. The mildness of our Government forbids the possibility of such a change. It can never be effected but under the misrule of despotism, and God forbid we should ever imitate France, either in Government or in the management of our citizens!

In every view then, Mr. Chairman, of the subject before us, pressed as has been the motion by its friends, I must give it my decided negative, convinced that in so doing I truly promote the public good.

Mr. HUGER said he rose to express his desire, that the Committee would take the question. He confessed he had made up his mind; indeed, after the talents and abilities displayed on the present question, he should suppose every member had received all the information possible on the subject, and he could not be wrong in thinking every gentleman had formed his opinion. Having been detained from the city much longer than he wished, he had voted, on a former occasion, that the subject should undergo such a discussion as to enable him to give a vote on the question; that had been allowed, and a mature discussion taken place.

In his opinion, Mr. H. said, the motion was at least premature—this was his opinion at first, but he wished to hear reasons against it, if any could be adduced. Supposing no new impressions could be made, why should the debate be prolonged? Some gentlemen might perhaps wish to give a reason for their vote; he wished such might be patiently heard.

If gentlemen wish to go farther, and extend their observations in the way the subject had been treated, they ought to publish in the newspapers what would have been their speeches on this occasion. This was not unfrequently done, and would much save the time of the House. Much had been said about our finances. Mr. H. conceived a trifling expense, such as this had been represented, was not worthy notice, especially as considerable advantages might be derived. When an expense was superfluous, it ought to be prevented; then it might be necessary to mention the financial state of the nation; but no such thing was now pretended. On the whole, he considered the present state of things called upon him to vote in the negative.

The question was called for, from different parts of the House, when

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and begged the attention of the Committee to a few observations, which if not granted as indulgence he should be obliged to demand as a right. He denied having asserted that our finances were in a situation which would not permit the raising of more money, however urgent the necessity. But he persisted in declaring that their condition was alarming, and that gentlemen had, instead of offering proof to support their opposition to the resolution, perpetually eluded the question—which was, whether there was danger, in the first place; and whether, in the second, these troops were competent to repel it. Gentlemen could not even agree in the use to which these troops were to be applied. Some asserted that they were to act in the first instance; the militia not being in a state of preparation. Others, sensible that they could not annihilate space and be present everywhere, said that the militia could oppose the foe until these troops could march to their relief. If gentlemen were persuaded of the danger of invasion there was no mode to convince them of their mistake. Mere impression could not be effaced by argument. But was it true policy to expend the “sinews of war” upon the chance of bringing these men into action? Mr. R. insisted that his use of the term mercenary, as applied to the Army of the United States, was warranted. He denied Mr. LEE’s interpretation of the word, which he had declared applicable only to foreign troops subsidized by another State. Mr. R. stated that the original word signified wages, and had no relation to foreign or domestic affairs. That a mercenary army was one in which the military art was carried on as a profession, in contradistinction from a militia or patriotic army, composed of citizens, without respect to station or fortune, indiscriminately bound to defend their country. He declared that he had no intention of receding from any opinions which he had expressed, but there was a term which he had used yesterday, and which (as no notice had been taken of it) he would exchange—it was ragamuffin. It had been extorted from him by the character and appearance of the recruits in his country; men the most abject and worthless of the community; and to their protection, said he, we are told to confide our liberties and independence. Sir, we revolt from the idea. We hold those blessings in contempt of their protection. We hold them in defiance of all force, foreign or domestic; we hold them, sir, by the tenure of that valor which obtained them.

Mr. R. denied that this tax would fall lightly upon the community. In the tobacco country it would be severely felt. The depreciation of that important article would alone cause great distress. If to this effect gentlemen were insensible, it would speak to them in a language which they would be obliged to hear, in the diminished amount of the revenue drawn from the imposts. The consumption of foreign articles must be limited by the ability to pay for them. The large importation of last year was scarcely half sold. There were goods enough on hand nearly sufficient to supply the ensuing year’s demand. Under all these circumstances we were hooted at for talking of economy. Whatever gentlemen might say or insinuate about speeches calculated to insure popular favor, he would never vote one shilling until he saw the public resources better husbanded. A gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ORIS,) who had taken exception to the term, had told us that we could not “squeeze” the public, without squeezing ourselves. Mr. R. said that he did not make professions of uncommon patriotism; that it was not the least of his objections to taxing his constituents that he must also burden himself, and his property being of that kind which exposed it to be “squeezed” on all occasions, rendered him particularly averse to the operation. The member from Massachusetts spoke lightly of our reluctance to part with money. That gentleman was eminent in a lucrative profession; and did he too derive a handsome revenue from talking, he might perhaps be less averse to voting away money.

A gentleman from South Carolina, in a long detail, to which I cannot, with my colleague, (Mr. LEE,) attach the epithet of a “learned history,” has been so very candid as to allow that the friends of the resolution (at least some of them) are actuated by pure motives in the support which they have given it. I felt disposed to thank the gentleman for this great degree of charity; but, sir, the burden of obligation was lifted from my shoulders when he talked of modern patriotism, which consisted in declamation against public burdens and a devotion to France. When it is considered that those against whom these insinuations were thrown, had not only “drawn in love of country with their mother’s milk,” but were attached by every tie which could bind the heart of man to the soil which gave him birth, and in which their property consisted, the Committee would decide upon the motives by which their conduct had been actuated. When it was recollected that they were supposed to have been peculiarly friendly to the mission to France and to be highly anxious for its success, whilst the opponents to the resolution exhibited a great coolness with regard to a compromise of differences with that Republic, he trusted that the alarm with respect to the effect of the measure under discussion upon that negotiation would wear off. Mr. R. declared that although he had become the object of what the member from South Carolina no doubt intended as a chastisement, he had no reason to regret it. He was, on the contrary, glad that he had excited the gentleman’s animadversion, since by that means the Committee had been favored with the very correct, luminous, and conclusive observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN,) which must have carried conviction to every unprejudiced mind, and would doubtless produce a decided approbation of the measure now under consideration.

Mr. R. said that although this army had been ordered into existence so long, yet scarcely 4,000 men were raised; and, if the recruiting went on, it would take a year perhaps to fill the regiments. Would not this be a stronger proof to France of our debility, than the disbanding of them, which would indicate only a prudent application of resources to proper objects. But, in fact, sir, this circumstance is a proof the most decisive of the inutility of this force. In spite of the system of alarm, and the cry of danger from French invasion, the good sense of the country still prevailed. Our people knew that there was no immediate danger, nor can they hear it in every breeze; they therefore refused to enter a service into which the indolent and worthless had been allured by the potent consideration of being clothed and fed at public expense. Would this tardiness to defend their country, sir, be exhibited were the danger imminent, as gentlemen had alleged? He cautioned the members of the House, particularly from the South, against lavishing, by the smallest estimate which had any pretension to correctness, at least two and a half millions, perhaps four, upon so worthless an object. As to the proposal to stop the enlistments and retain the officers upon pay, without any nominal duty to perform, he declared that it would justly excite the public indignation. With these remarks he concluded by expressing a hope that the resolution would be carried.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The Committee now rose, and reported their disagreement to the resolution.

The question was taken that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in their said disagreement, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 39, as follows:

MONDAY, January 13.

SAMUEL J. CABELL, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of Paul Bentalou, and others, merchants, of the city of Baltimore, late owners of the ship Flora, was presented to the House and read, stating that they have sustained considerable loss in consequence of an illegal detention, as they conceive, of the said ship at the port of Edgartown, in the State of Massachusetts, by the officers of the United States, acting under the law entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," and praying compensation for the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Two petitions of Cato West and others, in behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, were presented to the House and read; the first complaining of the political system by which the said Territory is governed, and the present mode of its administration, and praying that the operation of the ordinance of Congress, passed the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, with such amendments as shall seem expedient, may be extended to the said Territory: the other, praying that an act may be passed confirming to the citizens of the said Territory all grants of lands legally and justly obtained prior to the ratification of the late treaty with Spain.

Ordered, That the first of the said petitions be referred to Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. NOTT, and Mr. BARTLETT, to examine the matter thereof, and report their opinion thereupon to the House; and that the second be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, the petitions of John Henderson and others, and of Thomas Burling and others.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the ninth ultimo, so much of the President's Speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country," made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

A report made to me, on the fifth of this month, by the Secretary of War, contains various matters, in which the honor and safety of the nation are deeply interested; I transmit it therefore to Congress, and recommend it to their serious consideration.

JOHN ADAMS.

The said Message, and report accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the ninth ultimo, so much of the President's Speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country."

Ordered, That the petition of Charles Pettit, presented the 31st ultimo, and which was laid on the table, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War, on the seventh instant, exhibiting the expenses of the national armory at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts, which lay on the table, be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the ninth ultimo, so much of the President's Speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country;" with power to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant, transmitting sundry statements relative to the Mint of the United States, prepared by the officers thereof, and which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, Mr. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, and Mr. PAGE.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure and transmit to the Governor of the State of North Carolina, a number of copies of the laws of the United States, equal to the number which the Secretary was heretofore authorized to transmit to the Governor of the said State, by an act, entitled "An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States," to be deposited and distributed agreeably to the provisions of the said act, for the use and information of the citizens of the United States within the said State:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. HILL, Mr. KITTERA, and Mr. NICHOLAS.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the law passed on the twelfth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act respecting loan office and final settlement certificates, indents of interest, and the unfunded or registered debt credited in the books of the Treasury."

Resolved, That the act, entitled "An act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," and all acts for amendment of the same, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to consider and report as to the expediency of continuing the same, and whether any, and, if any, what, alterations may be necessary therein.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to repeal part of an act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the same without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to continue in force "An act declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland," and to continue "An act declaring the consent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island;" and that the Committee of Revisal, &c., do prepare and bring in the same.

TUESDAY, January 14.

An engrossed bill to repeal part of an act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine and report what laws of the United States have expired, or are near expiring, made a farther report, in part; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the motion to amend the "Act for laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper;" and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. MORRIS reported that the Committee had had the said motion under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the "Act for laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper," as to abolish the offices thereby established for the stamping of vellum, parchment, and paper, in the several districts of the United States, and to establish, at the seat of Government, one general office for that purpose.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in the same.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

As the enclosed letter, from a member of your House, received by me in the night of Saturday, the eleventh instant, relates to the privileges of the House, which, in my opinion, ought to be inquired into in the House itself, if anywhere, I have thought proper to submit the whole letter and its tendencies to your consideration, without any other comments on its matter or style: but, as no gross impropriety of conduct, on the part of persons holding commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States, ought to pass without due animadversion, I have directed the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the conduct complained of, and to report to me, without delay, such a statement of facts as will enable me to decide on the course which duty and justice shall appear to prescribe.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, Jan. 14th, 1800.

CHAMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE U. S.,
11th January, 24th of Independence.

SIR: Known to you only as holding, in common with yourself, the honorable station of servant to the same sovereign people, and disclaiming all pretensions to make to you any application which, in the general estimation of men, requires the preface of apology, I shall, without the circumlocution of compliment, proceed to state the cause which induces this address

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

For words of a general nature, uttered on the floor of this House, and addressed, in my official capacity, to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and urged with a view to effect the reduction of a Military Establishment, I have been grossly and publicly insulted, by two officers of the army (or navy, I know not which) with evident intention to provoke me to a conduct which, in some sort, might justify the hostile designs which they manifestly entertained towards me, and from the execution of which, I believe, they were only deterred by the presence of several of my friends (members of this House) who felt themselves implicated in an insult, which, although more particularly offered to one, was certainly levelled at all.

I am acquainted with the name of one only of these unfortunate young men, who appear to have made so false an estimate of true dignity of character; who seem to have mistaken brutality for spirit, and an armed combination against the person of an individual for an indication of courage. He was called, I think, McKnight—rank unknown,—and, to my best recollection, of the navy. Mr. Christie, a member of this House, appeared to know him; and that gentleman, with Capt. Campbell Smith, who, as I understood, endeavored to deter those rash youths from their scheme, and whose conduct would evince, if indeed there were any need of proof, that the character of the man and the citizen is not incompatible with the profession of the soldier, can give an account of the various instances of misconduct which were exhibited by the parties. Mr. Van Rensselaer, the Lieutenant Governor of New York, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Glenn, and Mr. Macon, of the House of Representatives, were likewise present at these transactions.

Having stated the fact, it would be derogatory to your character, sir, for me to point out the remedy, which it is your province to provide, nor shall I descend from the respect which I owe myself to declare what are not the considerations which govern my conduct on this occasion. So far as they relate to this application, addressed to you in a public capacity, they can only be supposed by you to be of a public nature; and it is enough for me to state that the independence of the Legislature has been attacked, the majesty of the people, of which you are the principal representative, insulted, and your authority contemned. In their name, I demand that a provision commensurate with the evil be made, and which will be calculated to deter others from any future attempt to introduce the reign of terror into our country. In addressing you, in the plain language of man, I give you, sir, the best proof that I can afford of the estimation in which I hold your office and your understanding; and I assure you with truth that I am, with respect, your fellow citizen,

JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. KITTERA moved that the Message and letter accompanying it be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped it would not. It was far from his expectation, he said, when he addressed the letter now before the House to the President, that it would have been made the subject of a communication. Had he thought the House could have remedied the abuse complained of, he would have entered his complaint here; but he did not conceive it within their jurisdiction; and he was opposed to it, as being a bad precedent, which might at some future period be prostituted to purposes injurious to the country. The power of the Commander-in-chief of the Army, in his opinion, was sufficient to afford a remedy, and to restrain men under his command from giving personal abuse and insult. And he therefore disclaimed any wish that the House should take measures for his protection.

The voice of the House appeared to be unanimous for the commitment, and several members expressed an opinion that the President, in submitting the subject to the House, had acted judiciously, it being a question on which he could not, dare not, decide. It was a Constitutional prerogative vested in that House alone, and that House, after having a statement of facts, were to be the sole judges of them. The wish of the complainant to suspend inquiry ought not to have any weight; for if a member was to be insulted for language made use of in debate, there was an end to all legislation, and they might as well return to their homes at once.

The said Message, together with the letter accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, Mr. MACON, Mr. KITTERA, Mr. JONES, Mr. SEWALL, Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS, and Mr. BAYARD.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to reform the Superior Court of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, rose and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 15.

Ordered, That Mr. MACON be excused from serving as a member of the committee to whom was referred the Message received, yesterday, from the President of the United States, and that Mr. HANNA be appointed in his stead.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish each of the Members of this House with a set of the laws passed by the Fifth Congress of the United States.

The House proceeded to consider the report made on Monday last, by the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country," which lay on the table; and the same being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"That, in the opinion of the committee, no such material change in the state of the foreign relations of the United States has happened, as would justify a relinquishment of any of the means of defence heretofore adopted by Congress, but that the national honor and interest in the present posture of affairs make it prudent and necessary to continue prepared for the worst event: but while danger still threatens our country, yet circumstances having diminished the probability of an immediate invasion, the attention of the committee has been particularly directed to the state of the Military Establishment, with a view to reconcile safety with economy, to preserve the establishment, and retrench the expense. The annexed abstract and letter from the Secretary of War exhibit the state of the twelve new regiments of infantry, according to the latest returns. As these men have received their bounty and clothing, and are daily improving in discipline; as they would be useful in any sudden emergency, and the greater part of them may also be usefully employed, until wanted for actual service, on the fortification of ports and harbors, it is conceived proper to retain them, but to suspend the recruiting service until the approach of danger shall compel the Government to resume it. This project combines the advantage of an important reduction of the national expense, with that of having at command a body of officers ready for service upon short notice, and a number of disciplined troops sufficient for the present occasion.

"The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, all enlistments under an act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," shall be suspended until the next session, unless war should break out between the United States and a foreign European Power, or in case imminent danger of invasion of their territory by any such Power shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States, be discovered to exist."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the resolution contained in the said report, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. OTIS, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. EDMOND, Mr. ABIEL FOSTER, Mr. CHAMPLIN, Mr. WALN, and Mr. HILL, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred the report of the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, made yesterday, recommending the appointment of a committee to prepare and bring in a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the act, entitled "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," be discharged from the consideration of the same; and that the said report be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, with power to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise, and with instruction to inquire and report in what manner, and to what effect, the act suspending commercial intercourse with France has been executed.

THURSDAY, January 16.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to suspend, in part, an act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 17.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory, northwest of the Great Miami river, was presented to the House and read, praying a repeal or amendment of the law providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the Ohio.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-third ultimo, the petition of Robert Sturgeon, made a report; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That Robert Sturgeon be discharged from his confinement, upon a judgment in favor of the United States, upon his making an assignment of all estate, real and personal, to which he may be entitled, to the acceptance of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, that the said judgment shall remain in full force against any property which he may hereafter acquire.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. OTIS, Mr. BIRD, and Mr. STONE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to suspend, in part, an act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 20.

A memorial of the General Assembly of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, signed by Edward Tiffin, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and H. Vandeburg, President of the Council, stating the unhappy situation of a large number of the citizens of the county of Hamilton, in the said Territory, residing on lands purchased from John Cleves Symmes, under a conviction that the said Symmes had a right to dispose of the same in virtue of his contract with the United States; that, having paid their money into the hands of Judge Symmes, they are deprived of the means of making their payments, as at present required by the United States; and requesting that such indulgence may be extended to the said purchasers as to the wisdom of Congress may seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws providing for the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the Ohio.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In obedience to the law, I transmit to Congress my annual account of the contingent fund.

The said Message, and account accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

Mr. C. GOODRICH, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 14th instant, together with a letter from JOHN RANDOLPH, JUN., a member of the House, accompanying the same, made a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was ordered, that the Message of the President, and Mr. RANDOLPH's letter to him, the report of the committee, and testimony accompanying it, be printed for the use of the members.

The reading of the testimony being called for, Mr. HARTLEY said, that as the whole was ordered to be printed, he thought it at present unnecessary, and therefore moved an adjournment.

Upon the question, Will the House adjourn? it was negatived—yeas 35, nays 56.

The testimony was then read, as follows:

Mr. Randolph's statement to the Committee.

JANUARY 18, 1800,

24th year of Independence.

SIR: A mature consideration of the subject induces me to suspect that a refusal on my part to communicate the information requested by you a few days ago could only have originated in a false delicacy, under the impulse of which I am determined never to act. I shall, therefore, proceed to state some instances of the misconduct of Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds, on the night of Friday, the 10th instant.

Exclusive of repeated allusions to what passed in the House of Representatives during the debate of the preceding day, and a frequent repetition of some words which fell from me during that discussion, in a manner so marked as to leave no doubt on my mind or that of Messrs. Van Rensselaer, Christie, or Macon, of their intention to insult me personally; finding me determined to take no notice of their words, they adopted a conduct which placed their designs beyond every possibility of doubt, and which they probably conceived to be calculated to force me into their measures. Mr. Christie had left his seat between me and the partition of the box; after which Mr. Van Rensselaer, who sat on the other side of me, lay down, so as to occupy a more than ordinary portion of room, and occasioned my removal to a part of Mr. Christie's former seat, leaving a very small vacancy between myself and the partition; into this Lieutenant Reynolds suddenly, and without requesting or giving time for room to be made for him, dropped with such violence as to bring our hips into contact; the shock was sufficient to occasion a slight degree of pain on my part, and for which it is probable he would in some degree have apologized had not the act been intentional.

Just before I left the box, one of them, I believe McKnight, gave me a sudden and violent pull by the cape of my coat; upon my demanding who it was, (this was the first instance in which I noticed their proceedings,) no answer was given; I then added, that I had long perceived an intention to insult me, and that the person offering it was a puppy. No reply that I heard was given.

It will be impossible for me, sir, to specify the various minute actions of these persons and their associates which tended to the same point. Suffice it to say that their whole deportment exhibited an insolence, and their every act betokened a bold defiance, which can neither be defined nor mistaken; and which, according to the general received opinions of the world, would not only have justified but *demand*ed chastisement.

Referring the committee to the numerous and authentic accounts of this transaction, which the gentlemen present are so well calculated to give, I remain with respect, sir, your fellow-citizen,

JOHN RANDOLPH, JUN.

The CHAIRMAN of the Committee, &c.

Mr. Christie's Affidavit.

On the 17th January, 1800, came the subscriber before the Hon. C. Goodrich, chairman of a committee of Congress, and being sworn, depose and saith, that, on Friday evening, the 10th of January, I was sitting in a box of the theatre: I was shortly after joined by Mr. Randolph, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Macon, Mr. Baer, Mr. Glen, General Van Cortlandt and Mr. Van Rensselaer, of New York; they all took seats near me; shortly after Mr. Baer went out of the box; the others remained; after the play was over, and about the time that the farce was beginning, I discovered in an adjoining box Captain McKnight and a gentleman, whose name I have since found to be Reynolds, both officers of the navy; I saw also in company with them Captain George Taylor, of this city; I saw them repeatedly look towards our box, and whispering to each other. When the procession came forward on the stage, Captain McKnight called out that they were well-looking mercenaries; I then began to discover, what I had before suspected, that some of these gentlemen intended to offer Mr. Randolph or some of us an insult, on account of the part we took in the House of Representatives respecting the army. It was my intention to have left the theatre early, but I remained, fearing a disturbance would take place between Mr. Randolph and those gentlemen, who manifestly evinced an intention of insulting him; Mr. Randolph took no notice of anything that was said; and I overheard a person (who it was I know not) say to Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds, "He does not hear you, go nearer to him;" Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds then left the box they were in, and came round into that in which we were, and got as close to Mr. Randolph as they could; so near as to touch him; Captain Taylor did not leave the box at the time they did, but remained behind; Captain McKnight called out to Captain Taylor, what do you think of these ragamuffins—these ragamuffins are not Pennsylvanians, they are black Virginia ragamuffins; Captain Taylor laughed, but made no reply; Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds afterwards repeated the words mercenaries and ragamuffins, and said that they were not well drilled, but would be better at the next session of Congress. Finding that none of us took any notice of what was said, Mr. Reynolds stepped with his feet on the seat on which Mr. Randolph was sitting, and sat down, although there was little or no room for a seat; he crowded Mr. Randolph in sitting down, and I believe sat upon his thigh; Mr. Randolph moved, to give as much room as he could. Mr. Reynolds remained for about fifteen minutes, and stepped back, upon which Captain McKnight came forward and took his place, observing the same conduct as Mr. Reynolds had done in sitting down. Captain McKnight spoke to me, and I gave him my hand; Captain George Taylor then came round to our box, and took his place at the back of Captain McKnight, and used once or twice the words mercenaries, and appeared to me to understand fully the intentions of Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds, and appeared to be desirous of forwarding their views; they all three remained in the box until the farce was over, and as Mr. Randolph got up to go out, I heard him call out "who was that that pulled me by the coat?" I looked, and saw Captain McKnight, Mr. Reynolds, and Captain Taylor, at his back; I got before them, and walked with Mr. Randolph; in going out of the lobby, a gentleman, whose name I do not know, told me not to leave that gentleman, (meaning Mr. Randolph,) for it was the intention of those persons to use him ill; I therefore walked with him to the head of the stairs, and in going down was pressed on so closely by Captain McKnight and others, that it was with difficulty I could keep on my feet; I looked back and called out to them not to crowd me, and they desisted; in going out of the house, Captain Taylor and Captain McKnight came arm in arm and pushed by us, and would hardly get out of our way, but walked slowly before us to the corner of Fifth street, when we turned off; Captain McKnight called to me and wished me good night, which compliment I returned. From the whole of their conduct, it appeared to me evidently the intention of the whole three to provoke Mr. Randolph to reply to their observations, so as to bring on a quarrel; that Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds did jostle Mr. Randolph on his seat, and used many expressions that fell from Mr. Randolph in the House of Representatives in the debate on the reduction of the army; and it appeared to me that they had taken offence at these expressions, and were determined to provoke him to a quarrel.

C. GOODRICH, Chairman, &c.Mr. Nicholson's Affidavit.

On the evening of Friday, the 10th instant, I went to the theatre, in company with Mr. Nicholas, Mr. Stone, Mr. Macon, and Mr. Randolph. When we reached the theatre, our company accidentally separated; Mr. Macon, Mr. Randolph, and myself going into one box. After remaining there some time, we were joined by Mr. Van Rensselaer, the Lieutenant Governor of New York, and General Cortlandt, of the House of Representatives. General Cortlandt and myself were seated on one of the front benches, and, as I was attending to the play, I did not hear the remarks which are said to have been made with the view of insulting Mr. Randolph. During the performance of the afterpiece, I was called out by Captain Campbell Smith, who informed me that he had understood Mr. Randolph had been insulted by some officers, and inquired if I had heard anything of it; at the same time stating the cause to be Mr. Randolph's observations of that day or the day before in Congress. I told Captain Smith I had heard nothing of it, and asked him about the kind of insult which had been offered; he answered that he was not present himself, but from what he had heard he was apprehensive of some disagreeable consequences. I remained in the upper part of the box, where I could see every thing passing in front, and observed with attention the two officers who had been pointed out to me; they were in conversation, but I was not near enough to hear it distinctly. Their names, I am told, are McKnight and Reynolds; the one dressed in plain clothes, or perhaps his coat might have been trimmed with a light edging of buff cloth; the other in a blue and red uniform, with a sword. At the conclusion of the entertainment, I stepped forward, with the intention of protecting Mr. Randolph from any injury, and at the same time called to him to know if he would walk. He, with Mr. Macon and a number of others, had risen from their seats, and were going out of the box. As one, if not both, of the officers remained behind, I suffered Mr. Randolph to pass me, designing to follow closely after him. At that time I saw Mr. McKnight throw himself forward, with one arm extended, and at the same moment heard Mr. Randolph call out "who was that that jerked my coat?"—Mr. McKnight passing by him just then. Mr. Randolph made the same exclamation a second time, and added that the person was a damned puppy, let him be who he might. Upon reaching the large passage, Mr. Macon, Mr. Christie, with several others, surrounded Mr. Randolph, and, in going down stairs, I felt myself pushed with great violence, as I thought for the purpose of throwing me upon Mr. Randolph. I found it necessary to resist the pressure, which I believe would have been impossible if I had not been a very heavy man. Whether Mr. McKnight was the person who jerked Mr. Randolph's coat, or whether those two officers were concerned in attempting to push him down stairs, I will not pretend to say. I have stated the facts as nearly as I can recollect them, and from those facts the committee will draw their own inferences.

It is necessary to add, that when Mr. McKnight threw himself forward in the box, as above stated, there were two persons passing between him and me, which prevented me from seeing whether he took hold of Mr. Randolph or not. The staircase was darker than usual, owing, I believe, to the lamps having burnt out, the hour being later than common; and this prevented me from seeing those persons who were pressing forward with so much violence.

JOSEPH H. NICHOLSON.

C. GOODRICH, Chairman, &c.Mr. Macon's Affidavit.

I was at the play last Friday night, and in the same box with Mr. Randolph and others. Some time after the play had been begun, the door of the box in which we were was opened so often that I turned towards the door to see who opened it, and what it could be for, but did not then discover any one going out or coming in, though I saw several people who had come into the box and taken seats behind us. Still looking towards the door, I saw a young man, with a blue coat, go out. Soon afterwards the door was opened again; I looked back, and saw him behind us, in company with a man who had on a uniform coat; others were also behind us. These men were frequently going out of the box, and, after a little time, returning again. I do not recollect to have heard either of them say a single word until the farce was begun, when the man dressed in blue said, these ragamuffins march very well, (the players were then marching.) At this time, I think, a third person was with them, who had on a great coat; if he was not, he was with them very soon after. The same words were quickly repeated by the same person standing near Mr. Randolph, who was sitting. Mr. Van Rensselaer, who sat by Mr. Randolph, and nearly behind me, said these men intend to insult Mr. Randolph; I answered, it appeared much like it. The word ragamuffin was afterwards used, though I do not know by which of the three. After this, when some of the players appeared in a different dress, words were spoken by one of these three men, which I do not know, nor could I hear them plain enough to understand clearly what they said. At another time, when the players were marching, one of these men, I know not which, said, these ragamuffins march badly; they want drilling, and will do better by another session. The man with the great coat did not, I think, stay long in the box, nor am I certain that he was there when these last words were spoken. The one with the uniform coat staid more in the box after the farce was begun than either of the others. The one with the blue coat continued to go out and to return. Both these men were in the box, I think, at the time we got up to go out. During the farce, and when the scenery was changing, Mr. Randolph stood up before his seat; as soon as he rose, the man who had on the uniform coat (and at this time I saw that he had a sword) stepped on his seat, and stood on it, until Mr. Randolph sat down; he then stepped off the seat, and immediately crowded in between Mr. Randolph and the side of the box, where there did not appear to be room for him to sit either with pleasure or ease. Mr. Randolph instantly made what room he could for him; he did not continue long in his new seat, but got up again, and stood behind us, where he had room neither to stand or sit.

As we were going out of the box, about the time the farce was finishing, Mr. Randolph being near the door and before me, I heard him ask who had taken hold of him, and said that whoever it was that he must be a puppy. I got to him as quick as I could, and before he went out of the box; several people were near him when I got to him; he went out of the box; we followed him; as soon as we had got clear of the box, a man said to Mr. Christie, keep near to that man, meaning, as I understood, Mr. Randolph; we walked to the stairs; Mr. Randolph went down before me; as I stepped on the stairs, I took hold of the hand of the man next to me, (I think it was General Van Cortlandt,) and supported myself with the other as well as I could, and it was with great difficulty that I was able to prevent being pushed down; some person behind me (I think it was Mr. Christie) said to those behind him, do not push so hard. Messrs. Van Rensselaer, Glen, and Christie, were nearer these men than myself, and may have heard their expressions more distinctly than I did.

Sir, the above is a statement of the facts you asked for. I have endeavored to keep it clear of the impressions that were made on me at the time.

C. GOODRICH, Chairman, &c.H. Glen's Affidavit.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 14, 1800.

HENRY GLEN, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, saith:

That in the evening of Friday, the tenth of this month, he went, in company with the Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer, Lieutenant Governor of the State of New York, to the theatre in this city. Finding vacant seats, we placed ourselves in a front box, where were Mr. Macon and Mr. Randolph, both members of the House of Representatives. I seated myself by the side of Mr. Macon, and the Lieutenant Governor took a seat by the side of Mr. Randolph. Looking round, I found Messrs. Baer, Christie, and Nicholson, all members of the House, were behind, not far from us.

After a very short time, two gentlemen in uniform, whom I took to be marine officers, came near, and were with us in the same box. In the course of the entertainments nothing happened, to my knowledge, to interrupt the cheerfulness and good-humor which prevailed among us.

When the afterpiece was performing, a number of men, with a drum, pikes, &c., appeared on the stage; upon a view of this scene, one of the gentlemen in uniform, addressing himself, as I supposed, to his companion, said, "I think our ragamuffins would make a better appearance than those men," or words to that effect. No particular notice appeared to be taken of the expression, and, as soon as the curtain was dropped, the officers back of us went out; so did the other gentlemen who were with us.

The Lieutenant Governor and I remained a little time in the box till the crowd had passed, and I saw none of the gentlemen before mentioned afterwards. This statement is made according to my best recollection.

Sworn to, on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1800, before me,

C. GOODRICH, Chairman, &c.Captain Campbell Smith's Deposition.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 15, 1800.

In obedience to the request of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, with the letter of Mr. Randolph, a member of your House, complaining of his having been insulted by two officers of the army or navy, as signified in the note of the honorable Mr. Goodrich to me of this day, I have only to state that I was not present or within hearing when the abuse, as alleged, took place; that I went into the theatre at a late period of the exhibition, but a very little time before the first part was completed, and was sitting, in company with Colonel Butler, in one of the lower boxes, when a gentleman of our acquaintance came and informed me of what had happened above, relative to Mr. Randolph and the officers, but whose expressions I do not now recollect; that immediately, aware in my own mind of the imprudence of such conduct in such a place, and apprehensive that some of my military acquaintances might be there, I went up stairs to the door of the box in which Mr. Randolph and some other members of Congress were sitting; at the door of the box, I met a gentleman of this city whom I knew, and of whom I asked the question, "Who is that gentleman in uniform?" looking at an officer in the box, and received for answer that he did not know, but if I wished to be acquainted with him, he would introduce me to Captain McKnight who was there, and who would introduce him to me; this, however, did not take place at this time. I afterwards discovered a member from Maryland, of my acquaintance, in the adjoining box, of whom I inquired if he knew what had happened? He answered in the negative; I told him what I had heard, and that I was apprehensive a fracas might ensue; in moving through the house, I met an officer of the army, to whom I mentioned my information and apprehensions; he accorded with me in opinion, and we went to the door of the box in which Mr. Randolph was. Here a tender was again made to me, by the same gentleman, of an introduction to Captain McKnight, which did not, however, occur; we went to another part of the house, and returned some little time afterwards, when, something being said which I do not now remember, the gentleman before alluded to called out Captain McKnight, and introduced me to him; the captain called out the gentleman in uniform, whose name I had inquired, and introduced him to me as Lieutenant Reynolds. Just after the usual salutes had occurred, our attention was called to the stage, and the captain and lieutenant returned (as I supposed) to their seats in the box, and I went to an opposite quarter of the house.

When the entertainments closed, I went out amongst the first, and stood on the pavement above the theatre, till I saw Mr. Randolph come out with several members of Congress; in their rear were the captain and lieutenant. They all moved down Chestnut street; I followed them to the corner of Sixth, and turned up and retired to my quarters.

The next evening I was in company with Mr. Randolph and several other members of Congress, when the occurrence at the theatre on the night before was talked of; from which company, as I retired, Mr. Randolph followed me into the entry of the house, and observed to me that he had taken the liberty to mention my name in a letter which he had that morning written to the President of the United States, requiring an investigation into what had happened the night before at the theatre; to which I replied that I had no objection to attest what I knew, and we parted.

CAMPBELL SMITH.

Question. Did you observe any acts or expressions of Captain McKnight, or of any other person, which you apprehended designed to insult Mr. Randolph?

Answer. I did not.

Q. Were you present at any time when Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds were in the box with Mr. Randolph?

A. I was several times at the door of the box in which those gentlemen were.

Q. Did you at any of those times observe any exceptional conduct on the part of those gentlemen?

A. I did not; they were sitting perfectly quiet.

Captain James McKnight's Statement.

On Thursday, the 9th instant, I returned to Philadelphia after having guarded fifty-four French prisoners to Fredericktown, Maryland; on the evening of my arrival I obtained permission to be absent until the day following; the night I spent with my family at Captain Decatur's seat, fourteen miles from the city, and I did not return until twelve o'clock on Friday, at which hour I was ordered on a court-martial, which did not adjourn until three o'clock; I did not quit my quarters until six o'clock, at which hour I went to the theatre alone, in an undress, and without arms; after remaining in the theatre for some time, I was joined by several acquaintances. On my return to the theatre, I went by accident into the box, where the person sat that I now know as Mr. Randolph; on the appearance of a number of persons in the garb of Turks, I remarked that our ragamuffins would make a better appearance, and several times during the evening, I repeated the words ragamuffins and mercenaries. A very interesting piece of scenery being introduced, most of the persons in the box rose up; finding my view obstructed, I stepped on a vacant bench; a person soon after sat on my feet; I desired him to rise, which he did, without any appearance or expression of anger; I soon after stepped behind, where (except for eight or ten minutes) I remained during the performance, but I am positive I never sat beside Mr. Randolph during the evening. At the time of quitting the box I had hold of Captain Taylor's right arm; the crowd was great; at the box door Captain Taylor was jostled, and I put out my arm (but without any violence) to make room; Captain Taylor and myself then went out before Mr. Randolph and his friends. We walked down Chestnut to Fifth street, at which place I wished Major Christie good night, and he returned the compliment, and I am certain that I never mentioned Mr. Randolph's name during the evening, nor did I know Mr. Randolph was to be at the theatre, nor do I ever recollect seeing him previous to Friday evening, and, from his youthful appearance and dress, I had no idea of his being a member of the House of Representatives; and I trust it will not be supposed I would do an act that would be an infringement of the privileges of Congress, for whom I have the highest respect.

Michael Reynolds's Statement.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 16, 1800.

On Friday evening, the 10th instant, Lieutenant Thomson and myself went to the theatre, and, after some time being seated, were joined by Captain McKnight; during the performance of Blue Beard, there appeared on the stage a number of strange figures, when some one of the gentlemen present made use of the expression that the ragamuffins would make a much better appearance; to which I replied, that could not be doubted; but as to my knowing of Mr. Randolph's being in the adjoining box, I did not, until I heard some one behind me mention it; and as to our having any previous conversation relative to our going to the play to insult him, or any other gentleman, it never entered my head; I went to the play-house in uniform and with my side-arms, and am confident that none of the other gentlemen in the box with us had either uniform or side-arms.

James Thompson's Statement.

On Friday, the 10th instant, Lieutenant Reynolds and myself attended the theatre, and, after being some time in the house, were joined by Captain McKnight; I neither knew nor expected to meet Mr. Randolph, although it so happened that we got into a box adjoining (without design) the one in which he, with other members of the House of Representatives, was seated; soon after Captain McKnight's coming over to us, which was not until long after our having been in the house, some remarks were made on the performance and performers, in which the words ragamuffins and mercenaries were used; although Captain McKnight was in the same box behind Mr. Randolph, yet I neither saw nor heard him address himself to that gentleman; and, while I was present, nothing like a personal insult appeared to me to be offered, unless his repeating the words above can be so construed.

Questions by Captain McKnight.

Question. Did you see me seat myself by Mr. Randolph in the course of the evening?

Answer. I did not; but it might have happened without my observing it.

Q. Were we constantly together during the performance of the farce?

A. We were either in the adjoining boxes, or, it may be, for a little time, in the same box; but in full view of each other, and within speaking distance the whole time.

Q. Was I not in an undress and without any weapon that evening?

A. You were in an undress, and without any weapon which I knew of.

Q. Did you leave the theatre with Lieutenant Reynolds, and when?

A. I staid in the box, and Lieutenant Reynolds was with me there, after Mr. Randolph left it; and we came away together, and did not see Mr. Randolph after he left the box. Captain McKnight left the box before Mr. Randolph, and I did not see him afterwards that evening.

Q. Did you hear me mention Mr. Randolph's name that evening at the playhouse?

A. I did not, that I recollect.

Questions by the Committee. Did Captain McKnight use the expressions mentioned by you, of ragamuffins and mercenaries, or by whom were those expressions used?

Answer. I think by Captain McKnight. He asked Lieutenant Reynolds if he did not think the ragamuffins would perform better than those on the stage; alluding, as I understood, to a procession in the farce; to which Lieutenant Reynolds answered he thought they would.

Q. Did you know of any particular application those expressions were intended to have?

A. I do not know Captain McKnight's intention; nothing was ever said by him, or any other person, in my presence, of any intention of insulting Mr. Randolph or any other person.

Q. Did you hear any person say to Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds, he does not hear you, go nearer to him?

A. I did not.

Q. When did Captain McKnight leave the box where he first came to you, and in what manner?

A. I do not recollect whether Captain McKnight left that box before the conclusion of the play, but, in the interval between that and the farce, Captain McKnight, with several other gentlemen and myself, went together to a public house in the neighborhood of the playhouse and supped together, and on our return to the playhouse Captain McKnight went into the box where Mr. Randolph was, and remained there during the farce, or was there the most of the time.

Q. Did you see any person take hold of Mr. Randolph, or pull his coat?

A. I did not; but I heard Mr. Randolph, as he left the box, say that some person had taken him by the shoulder, evidently to insult him, or words to that effect.

Q. Have you any knowledge where Capt. McKnight was at the time Mr. Randolph made that observation?

A. At the time Mr. Randolph made the observation I have mentioned, Captain McKnight had left the box and was forward of Mr. Randolph.

Q. Did Captain McKnight, in going out of the box, pass Mr. Randolph, and in what manner?

A. We passed Mr. Randolph immediately before he made the observation I have mentioned; but I did not see Captain McKnight touch Mr. Randolph.

William W. Burrows's Affidavit.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 18, 1800.

I, WILLIAM W. BURROWS, do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelist of Almighty God, that I ordered Captain James McKnight to march on the 18th December last, with a detachment of marines, to guard some French prisoners to Fredericktown, in Maryland.

On Thursday, 9th January, at three o'clock in the afternoon, he arrived here, after a fatiguing march; and after reporting his arrival to me, he asked leave to go that evening to see his family, about eight miles from the city. He accordingly went, and returned about twelve o'clock, the next day, when he was immediately ordered to sit on a court-martial, which did not break up till near three o'clock. He then went to his dinner, and, as I have understood since, from thence to the theatre.

Jonathan H. Hurst's Deposition.

JONATHAN H. HURST, of the city of Philadelphia, maketh oath that, on the evening of the 10th instant, he was present at the theatre, and for some time in a box adjoining that in which was seated Mr. Randolph, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, from the State of Virginia; that he saw in the same box Captain McKnight, of the United States' Marine Corps, standing immediately behind Mr. Randolph; that he heard the chief part of the conversation which passed between Captain McKnight and several gentlemen who were near him during the performance of the opera or entertainment of Blue Beard; that he (J. H. Hurst) looked frequently to that part of the box where Captain McKnight stood; that he did not see any violence offered to Mr. Randolph by Captain McKnight, nor did he see Captain McKnight at any time crowd, jostle, or touch Mr. Randolph; nor did he (the said J. H. Hurst) hear Captain McKnight utter any word or words insulting or disrespectful to Mr. Randolph. And he further saith that Captain McKnight was not in uniform, nor was he armed, nor was there any visible or audible interference on the part of any person near Mr. Randolph to deter Captain McKnight or his acquaintance present from any apprehended ill treatment to Mr. Randolph.

JONATHAN H. HURST.

Question by the Committee. Did you hear Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds use the expressions "mercenaries, ragamuffins" and in what manner?

Answer. I heard Captain McKnight ask one of his acquaintance present, of whom I do not recollect, whether he thought that band, alluding to some of the performers in the farce then acting, as I understood it, could stand against our ragamuffins, alluding, as I understood, to the army of the United States. There was no pointed answer given, as I recollect, and the question appeared to me to be a matter of common conversation; and though at first I was not sensible of its being intended for Mr. Randolph, yet, looking upon him soon after, I thought he smiled as if he had heard it.

Question by Captain McKnight. Did you, in the course of the evening, hear me or Lieutenant Reynolds speak of Mr. Randolph, or mention his name?

Answer. I heard some gentlemen in the box speak of Mr. Randolph, as pointing him out to others, but I cannot say that this was to or by Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds.

JONATHAN H. HURST.

The foregoing deposition was sworn to on the 18th day of January, Anno Domini 1800.

C. GOODRICH, Chairman, &c.George Taylor's Deposition

Some time during the performance on Friday evening, the 10th instant, at the theatre, I was called by Captain McKnight, to inform me of the marriage of an officer who had been on a detachment under his command, and from which he had that day returned. After some time we were joined by other persons, when a general conversation took place respecting the ragamuffins on the stage. There was a number of comparisons made, but they were general, and no names were mentioned. Of the persons in the box with myself there was but one in uniform, or with side-arms. In a part of Blue Beard, interesting as to scenery, the persons in the same box with me generally rose. I was on the right of Captain McKnight, and saw that those before him were taller than himself. It appears to me that he stepped on the seat before him to have a fair view of the scenery or stage. My attention was, for an instant, taken from the performance by hearing Captain McKnight say to some one, "Sir, you are sitting on my feet;" that person rose, and made a slight inclination of his head. Captain McKnight resumed his former situation, as did the one before him. After what is above related, Lieutenant Campbell Smith, from the door of the box, called me, and asked the name of an officer, then sitting in the box, the only one in uniform, except himself, there present, to whom I had never been introduced, or, to my knowledge, seen before that night. From my knowledge of Mr. Smith I did not feel myself disposed to satisfy his mere curiosity, or mention a name I had heard accidentally and scarcely recollected; I therefore asked him if he had any reason or particular object for knowing it. His reply was, that he saw a great many strange faces in uniform, and, wearing one himself, he wished to know the names of others who did. I then told him I would make him known to Captain McKnight, who would introduce him. Mr. Smith then used an expression which I considered as in nowise averse to the introduction of himself to Captain McKnight, which was done in the lobby. After some slight commonplace observations I saw no more of Lieutenant Smith. I had accepted an invitation from Captain McKnight to go home with him after the performance of the theatre. We were anxious to get out before the crowd from the upper part of the house would fill the lobby. To accomplish this, we passed a number of persons, one of whom, not known to me, caught my left arm; I took it for granted that it was to assist himself either to rise from the floor to the seat, or to prevent him from falling.

Captain McKnight had hold of my right arm. The tug I received from the left must have affected him, I think; at any rate it separated us. I am inclined to believe Captain McKnight put his hand on the shoulder of some person and passed on. I did not overtake him until he was out of the box, when we, by his request, looked for some gentlemen to be of our party to his house, which we did, there and in the street, but could not find them.

GEORGE TAYLOR.

Question by Captain McKnight. During the performance of the farce, were we not so near each other, and to Lieutenant Reynolds, that if any violence had been offered by him or me to Mr. Randolph, you must have observed it?

Answer. I think I was near Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds the whole time, and must have observed any unusual conduct by them.

Questions by the Committee. Did you, in the evening in question, either before you went to the theatre, there, or at any time afterwards, know of any intention on the part of Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds to affront Mr. Randolph?

Answer. I did not.

Q. Did you observe Mr. Randolph at the time of your leaving the box, or hear any words from him respecting his being insulted?

A. I did not observe Mr. Randolph at that time, nor hear any words from him. Captain McKnight and I were going out of the box together, and I was separated from him by some person giving me a pull by the arm with some violence, but we joined again soon after in the lobby.

The reading having been gone through with, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to repeal part of an act, entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto, which were severally read.

The amendment to the ninth section, reported from the Committee of the Whole, being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The other amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole were then again read, amended, and, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments,

SUSPENSION OF ADDITIONAL ARMY LAW.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to suspend in part the act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; when, after several amendments having been made to the bill,

Mr. RANDOLPH proposed the following:

"Be it further enacted, That the men now enlisted under the said act, shall be formed into as many regiments as they are sufficient to complete; to be officered, at the discretion of the President of the United States, out of the officers of the said twelve regiments; and that the supernumerary officers, together with such officers of the general staff as in his opinion will not be necessary for the discipline of the said regiments, so to be formed as aforesaid, shall be discharged, and be entitled to receive, besides the allowance directed by law to be paid at their discharge, each one month's pay."

Mr. RANDOLPH said, his object in proposing this amendment to the bill was to consolidate the men already enlisted into as many regiments as they would make; and as there could be no use, but great expense, in maintaining the officers who remained, they might be discharged. He believed it would be generally conceded that the number of men now enlisted were not more than sufficient to fill six regiments, but the whole of the officers were appointed and on pay for the twelve regiments. As the recruiting would now be stopped, he was not disposed to see the public money squandered away unnecessarily.

If an invasion should happen there would be need of a much greater quantity than the whole, and then a number adequate to the exigency could be raised; without it, these officers would be useless. To keep up an army of officers without men to command, would be an expensive folly. He could have wished the whole force disbanded, but not being able to obtain that, it became his duty to endeavor to reduce it to the narrowest possible grounds.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said the bill upon the table was to him extremely disagreeable. Coming from that respectable quarter, the Committee of Defence, and being supported by a number of his friends, he should have been content with giving a bare vote in opposition to it, had not this proposition come forward. He conceived it would be fatal to this country to recede from any one measure of defence. He wished this army to be filled up agreeably to the law as it stood originally, because he sincerely believed it highly probable that it would be wanted. But, in addition to a bill which in itself was receding from our original defence, an amendment more fatal still was proposed. Mr. R. believed it much more easy to get men than to get officers. Many gentlemen had made considerable sacrifices to serve the country, they abandoned profitable employments to get into the army; it would therefore be extremely wrong to discharge them before the object was completed for which their patriotism induced them to enter. He said his feelings should never overcome what he conceived the interests of his country required; but it could never require this paltry, pitiful economy. Indeed, he did not believe it true economy, because, if the men were wanted again, the officers would be indispensably necessary; and the recruiting would necessarily be much impeded if they were now discharged, because they would not be induced to engage again in the service.

Mr. R. believed the resources of this country were far beyond what gentlemen had represented in a late debate; he believed them fully adequate to the maintenance of any army whatever. In talking of our means, it had been insinuated that this was a permanent establishment. It was no such thing. It was an extraordinary army, raised for an extraordinary occasion, which occasion was not yet accomplished. Our children, who had been referred to, would never complain of the debt which was left them to pay, when they considered the occasion there was to incur that debt; they would rather regard the attention paid to the permanent interests of the country with gratitude.

The military art, Mr. R. observed, was a science; gentlemen of the army, if they were continued in their stations, could be acquiring a more competent knowledge in that science in this interim, and fit themselves for usefulness, when they were to be called to action.

As for the prejudice of the people to the army—though it was true that they were against the standing army, and it was possible they might be, in a little corner of a State, generally against all these kinds of preparations, but it was not so universally. He rather believed, in respect to the insults from France, that the sentiments of the public were far in advance of the Government—he knew it to be so in South Carolina; they thought the Government tardy, and therefore proceeded to measures of defence themselves, tired of waiting for the Government.

Mr. R. lamented that gentlemen, who had always expressed their desire for strong measures, should be prevailed upon to take steps which were receding from their former ones. If this were encouraged, the evil would not stop here; every measure of defence would be successively attacked by others, who readily caught at every opportunity. He believed this from the progress which was making towards it. These soldiers were to be disbanded; now the officers were to be discharged; besides this, there was a motion lying on the table to recede from another measure of defence (the Sedition bill;) next it would be moved to stop the building of the seventy-fours; and when or where would it end, until the total subversion of the whole? If this kind of proceeding was encouraged, it would be impossible to say to what a state of prostration our nation would be brought. He therefore thought his duty called upon him to vote against every innovation upon the system, until the occasion was removed.

Mr. PLATT said he had voted against the late resolution to disband the army; the reasons which were urged against that motion made a strong impression on his mind, and, although nearly a week had elapsed, he still retained that impression. It was unnecessary to recapitulate those arguments, he would only observe that the whole course of reasoning against the former resolution appeared to him to apply with at least equal force against the present measure. A very considerable expense would have been saved by disbanding the army, and in that point of view alone, the inducement to that measure was strong; but it was contended on very good grounds, he believed, that it would indicate a want of union and stability in our councils, which at this particular crisis it was so important to maintain. It appeared to him that the suspension of enlistments by a law of Congress was in effect the same thing in that point of view, as a law to disband the army—it discovered the same relaxation of spirit, and indicated the same fluctuating policy. And what was the inducement to this measure? The small additional expense of the few soldiers who may be enlisted for the three months to come. This, he said, appeared to him to be a pitiful saving indeed; and such as would not justify the Government in abandoning that system of measures which had hitherto been so successful, and which had made so strong and so favorable an impression on one enemy. We shall probably know the result of the pending negotiation within three months. If peace and security shall be restored, the army in question would cease with the law which created it, and if a third attempt to negotiate shall fail of success, who is prepared to say that the whole twelve regiments will not be necessary? There was one point of view in which this subject was not before considered. The President of the United States had informed them that, in his judgment, sound policy dictated the renewal of negotiation with France, but that in order to give effect to that negotiation, our whole system of defensive measures ought to be firmly maintained. In our answer to his Speech we explicitly approve of the conduct and views of the President with regard to the mission, and we concur with him in opinion that no relaxation ought to be made in defensive measures; he therefore thought they owed it to the Executive, they stood pledged, to maintain the ground on which the negotiation was commenced. They were bound to afford every advantage in their power to enable the President to bring the negotiation to a favorable conclusion. But, by adopting the measure they certainly did relinquish a part of the ground on which the President had founded his measures. Instead of seconding the efforts of the President, the present measure would counteract the exertions of the Executive arm; and by pursuing this course, said he, we shall assume the responsibility of a measure which must certainly be attended with very important consequences to this country. I think, sir, we ought to allow a fair trial to the negotiation under all possible advantages, and to leave the high responsibility of that measure where it now rests.

Mr. HARTLEY said he did entertain a hope that this bill would have passed pretty unanimously, and he was therefore sorry to see any attempts made towards its destruction. The gentleman who had proposed the section had evinced his perfect aversion to any Military Establishment whatever—he did not wish to have a single officer or soldier—but Mr. H. hoped his attempts towards it would fail, for though he liked the bill, he disliked the amendment.

These officers were now at their posts; they have been selected with the best aid our Executive could have—such as could not be had again—the aid of the wise WASHINGTON; if they were dismissed, they would many of them refuse to return if called for, and a new, but less complete selection must be made. This would make the measure an essential injury to the country.

Mr. H. said he wished our citizens no more to be disturbed with the unnecessary noise of the drum, and therefore he hoped that recruiting would be suspended, but at present he thought it would be very improper to discharge the officers. On this account he should vote against the proposed section, but in favor of this bill without it.

Mr. COOPER professed himself against the amendment as well as against the whole bill. He was convinced that the prosperity of the United States was intimately connected with this army, and it must be a weakness in the Government to relax any part till the object was obtained. If the object was not obtained, how unwise, how undignified, would this measure then appear; and, thus uncertain, how ill-timed was this relaxing system proposed. It was not wisdom to do to-day what must be undone to-morrow. The gentlemen who had proposed this defensive system, and procured its establishment, in his opinion, were pulling down what they once with so much wisdom reared, by introducing the bill at all.

Mr. C. went into the former debate of the House on the motion for disbanding the army; he considered it an inconsistency in the conduct of gentlemen who opposed that motion to propose this bill.

Mr. OTIS vindicated himself from the inconsistency charged. As for himself, he said, he was only the humble organ of the Committee of Defence, for whom he reported the bill. But, however, it was his opinion that the bill was proper. As to the amendment he opposed it. The question the other day was to disband the army. That was negated. Now the motion is to disband a part of it—the officers. If the officers were to be sent home and the staff pulled down and annihilated, he conceived it would be equivalent to disbanding two-thirds of the whole army, because the recruiting could not go on as soon as it probably might be wanted. There was no argument, in his opinion, which was used against disbanding the whole army, that could not with equal propriety be applicable to the present motion. He therefore hoped the dignity of the House would not be so impaired, as it must be by enlarging the discussion of the present motion, but that the question would be taken immediately.

JANUARY, 1800.

Mr. HARPER opposed the proposition because of the considerable delay such a motion must make if the necessity should return for raising this army. A new selection of officers must be made, for he presumed very few of those discharged would serve again. It was true there were plenty of applications for commissions, but a long time would be necessary to procure the information necessary to make a wise selection. He did not think it an economical measure, for the delay and expense which would accrue in making the arrangements would equal the pay of the officers for the short time they would probably be now in the service.

Mr. MACON could not agree with the gentleman (Mr. RUTLEDGE) that officers were hard to be had; during the war there were plenty of able officers to be obtained. Indeed the report of the Secretary of War confirmed the truth of this opinion; there was not a single regiment complete in men, but the whole of the officers were appointed. It was an unnecessary use of money. It had been said to be a small expense. That argument could not warrant the ill use of it. "Take care of the pence, the pounds will take care of themselves," was an old but true adage. Therefore, no saving whatever was "pitiful," or "paltry."

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) had said it was not a standing army. Mr. MACON did not know what then to call it. It must be a militia army or a regular army; the word regular, applied to the army, had always been considered synonymous with a standing army. They certainly could not be called militia; then they must be regulars—a standing army.

The President, in his opening Address to the House, had given advice that the House ought to examine and see where any saving could be made; no doubt he meant to examine into every item of the expenditure. If only the pay of one officer could be saved it would be prudent to do it. He liked the amendment for the principle of it, because it went to lessen the public expenditure; and having failed in the attempt to get the men disbanded, he considered it his duty to come the nearest possible to it, and vote for discharging the supernumerary officers. As the enlistments were to be stopped, the officers could be of no use: then why not discharge them?

It had been supposed that these patriotic officers would not return to the service, if this dismissal took place, but new ones must be sought. Mr. MACON had no doubt but the same patriotism which brought them out on a certain occasion, would induce them to return to their homes if the Government had no more need of their services, and that they would as cheerfully return to the service, if there ever should be occasion for them; or their patriotism would be very mutable indeed, and unworthy their profession.

Mr. BAYARD conceived that a right view of this subject must convince the House that it would be a real saving to keep the officers. From the report of the Secretary of War it would appear that the army referred to were at present stationed at great distances, one part from the other. Agreeably to the report of the Secretary of War it appeared that these twelve regiments (or what were enlisted of them) were stationed in the following manner: Three regiments in the vicinity of Providence river, near Uxbridge, Massachusetts; three regiments in the vicinity of Brunswick, New Jersey; three regiments in the vicinity of Potomac, near Harper's Ferry, Virginia; three regiments in the vicinity of Augusta, above the Falls of Savannah.

Were this amendment to pass, said Mr. B., it would become the duty of the Executive to take immediate steps to order their removal from their present positions, in order to form them into complete regiments. The expense of removing from their present cantonments, marching, forage, &c., must be very considerable. Again: If the officers were to be reduced, could it be done in a minute? How is the Executive to determine who were the officers to discharge, and who to retain? If they were to draw lots, it must take considerable time—three or four months would not be sufficient. But, on the other hand, it was possible that the negotiation might be successful in one month, and if so, they would then be discharged by the law upon the bare wages due to them for the time they served. But the amendment was calculated to give them a month's pay. Surely, from these considerations, it would be an eventual saving to keep them until the success of the negotiation is known. But suppose peace was not made with France, would it be prudent in that event to discharge them? Mr. B., conceived not, for he had no doubt but they would then think of invading this country, and having that apprehension, he should be sorry to see the country unprotected; for surely retaining these officers would much facilitate enlistments, if they should be required to go on.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that the enemies to the bill would no doubt be opposed to the amendment, but he could see no good reason why it should be exceptionable to other gentlemen. If there exists no necessity for calling into service a greater number of men than are already enlisted, surely there can be no propriety in retaining in pay a greater number of officers than are necessary to command.

Notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. C. was of opinion that economy dictated the adoption of the amendment. He knew of no great additional expense which would attend the removing and concentrating of this army, other than the transportation of the baggage, nor did he suppose that any length of time would elapse before the President could act under this law. If, in the mean time, a treaty should be concluded, the army would be disbanded of course, and the law could have no operation. But if the negotiation fails, and no danger of invasion exists, the amendment would free the people of the United States from a great and unnecessary expense.

It had been said, that the officers should be retained in service, since the military art was a science of great intricacy, and difficult to be acquired. Mr. C. was of opinion, that the knowledge of war was principally to be acquired in war; that, so far as relates to the theory necessary to aid the practical officer, we had a number of characters already in the study of it—he alluded to the officers of the militia—and, from among them, suitable persons may be chosen to take command in a regular army in time of danger.

It had also been urged, that if the officers should resign or be discharged, and the exigencies of the nation should shortly require their services, it might be attended with delay and trouble to obtain suitable successors. Mr. C. apprehended no such difficulties; heretofore they had not been experienced; our fellow-citizens had on all occasions manifested a disposition to accept of command in our armies. At this time the Secretary of War, no doubt, possessed a long list of respectable applicants, and their characters were always portrayed by their friends when they applied for appointment. It could not therefore be difficult or tedious to make a good selection, where the necessary "materials" were continually in possession of the proper department.

Mr. MARSHALL said, this was precisely the same question as had taken up so much time in the House, and had been maturely discussed, and on which a majority of the House had expressed an opinion by rejecting the motion to disband the army. He would call the attention of the House to the particular principle upon which that decision was grounded. It was this: The state of the country at the present moment was such as to leave it absolutely uncertain whether the twelve regiments would or would not be necessary for our defence, but that the period would soon arrive when that uncertainty would be removed. On these grounds, it was the determination of the House not to recede from any measure they had ordered, nor to progress, and agreeably to that principle a bill was reported to suspend the enlistments.

Mr. M. called to the recollection of the House some of the arguments which were used against the motion to disband the army, and applied them to the present amendment. A large majority, he said, then decided in favor of maintaining exactly the same ground as at present, and he presumed no circumstance had appeared to change the opinions of the House on that point. The adoption of the motion would certainly very materially derange the system. Gentlemen supposed the President could re-create the officers. He could not do it without the law should have been fully executed, and nothing should remain to do in it; the Executive could not therefore create an officer. Besides, there would be a great inconsistency; the bill pointed to an event when recruiting must recommence, but the amendment removed that power, by taking away the officers who were to execute that service, besides leaving the men recruited (if it were possible) without officers! Thus, though the time was appointed, the means were taken away, until at a future meeting of Congress an act should be passed to enable him to appoint officers.

If the number of men were never to be increased, then indeed the arguments in favor of discharging the officers would be unanswerable, but in the prospect of such an event as an increase, those arguments must fail. It was, and with propriety, thought prudent to retain the skeleton of an army to enable the President, in case of invasion, or actual war, to recommence the recruiting service.

It was observed that the same patriotism which called forth the spirit of our citizens to accept of commissions, would excite them again to enter the service. Mr. M. believed it to be a fact; he believed they would again enter the service if required. No doubt but they did estimate love of country sufficient to obey the orders of their country, at any time, or in any way; but would it be right and proper to call gentlemen from their occupations and families, and dismiss them before the service was performed in which their patriotism called them out, merely because their zeal could be depended on? He hoped the national spirit would never yield to that false policy. He hoped the now existing station would be maintained, and no measure at present be receded from on which the country had placed their confidence for defence.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not think, with gentlemen who had spoken against the present amendment, that the same reasons which were used in opposition to the other motion, were also applicable to the present one. If he understood the arguments of gentlemen at that time, they concurred in this: that they would not give up the effective defence in their hands, until the extinguishment of the danger, to provide against which they were established. But what would be the operation of the present motion if adopted?

The House had determined that no more men should be raised, even if the negotiation with France should fail, unless the failure was followed by actual war or threatened invasion; if, therefore, the present motion was rejected, there would be three times the number of officers in the pay of the country, and they must, in case the negotiation fail, remain until the next session of Congress—at least necessary for the men. How would this contribute to the strength of the country, or how to another object gentlemen had mentioned, military discipline? These men would always be at their homes, and acquire habits not useful either to themselves or the country.

It was said that if discharged before the accomplishment of the services for which their patriotism brought them away from their homes, they would be unwilling to return when wanted, and that, when the necessity was most urgent, there would be great delay in procuring others. The gentleman who used this argument had answered it by telling you that the War Department has made provision for officering an eventual army of 50,000 men. If so, it could be no difficulty to procure officers at any time. If these officers might not all find it convenient to return, others could be appointed without any trouble or delay, whenever it might be necessary to augment the army.

It is well known that a much more numerous class of citizens were willing to go into the eventual army, (as it is called,) provided for time of real danger, than into the one now under consideration; therefore, the probability would be in favor of a better selection, for there would be a larger field to choose from. Again: most of the officers had most likely tried their efforts at enlistment. Was it not probable that new officers would be likely to draw into the service men who might be particularly attached to them, but who else would not have entered? If these were sound arguments, the article of expense was not the consideration, but the actual power of the country would still be increased in the event of danger.

The gentleman from Delaware, Mr. N. said, used an argument which appeared to him extremely weak. He had said the amendment now proposed would probably be more expensive than the law as it now stands, for in all likelihood the army will be disbanded by the terms of its enlistments before this law could be executed. How this was to be, he could not conceive. If the occasion for this army should cease before the dismissal of the officers, they would be dismissed under the original law; if it should not, this measure could not increase the expense.

Another objection, and one which was relied upon, was, that it would be out of the power of the President to re-appoint the officers, even if he should find occasion to order the enlistments to go on. To this objection it might be answered that the old law would still remain in force, and the same power which could direct the enlistments to be made could appoint the officers. Regiments of men were always accompanied with a suitable number of officers, and therefore if the President was empowered from the existence of certain circumstances to raise so many regiments, he was equally empowered to appoint a certain number of officers to command them. Suppose a vacancy happened in the army, the President always had the power to fill it; by the same rule could these appointments take place. But if any gentleman should think the construction of the law would be mistaken in that particular, he might amend it so as to make its operation certain.

Gentlemen appeared to suppose a kind of necessity existed to keep these officers, because their patriotism had called them out. The original contract by which they were brought into the service did not bind the country to keep them longer than the exigencies of the times required; they had therefore no claim upon the country, and it was not consistent with that professed patriotism to wish to stay in the service a moment longer than they could be serviceable. Mr. N. admitted that they would be under no obligation to return.

Upon the whole, as officers could be of no use to the country without men, and as it would always be easy to procure officers when it might be necessary to raise men, Mr. N. sincerely hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. GALLATIN did not conceive it would be necessary to remove the regiments from where they now are, and consequently no new expense would be incurred by consolidating the men already raised into regiments. Suppose they would make four regiments complete; as he supposed they were now nearly equally divided in four different stations, each of them could have one regiment, and if any companies remained as a surplus, they could stay where they now are. Thus the supposed expense of removal would be saved. It was also thought that three or four months would be necessary to execute this measure. Mr. G. thought it might be done in two or three weeks, by the mode above proposed. If this could be done, of which he had no doubt, these objections must fail.

If this amendment did not obtain, a number of officers, three times more than was requisite, would be detained in pay, for a considerable length of time, without any service for them to perform. The officers perhaps were the most expensive part of the establishment, and if that could be saved, it would certainly be an object meriting attention; it would be a duty incumbent on the House to dispense with the expense.

Some gentlemen had said, if this measure was adopted it would be a dereliction of the defensive system, and that the arguments used the other day were sufficient to oppose this measure as well as that for disbanding the army already raised. Certainly it was not so—although it was conformable to the same principle, and on that account he approved of it. Mr. G. acknowledged himself to be against the whole establishment, and the more it was reduced, the more he should be gratified; but he trusted it would not be thought that this was the same question which was negatived the other day. This was rather a middle ground, and such a one as he hoped gentlemen who professed to desire a medium would approve of.

This was not a question which had already been decided. If it was proper that the establishment should be so far reduced as to prevent the completion of the twelve regiments ordered by the act, a bill founded on that position ought to include a principle like the one now proposed, or it would not be complete in itself. If gentlemen would review the arguments on which the former motion was opposed, it would be evident that they did not apply to the amendment now before the House. Among other arguments against disbanding the army, a principal one was, its effect on the negotiation. Surely the reduction of the officers could not be opposed on that ground, even when added to the other part of the bill for preventing farther enlistments, because another argument then used would not even affect it—that of receding from our defensive position. The present situation was maintained the same by this bill; it was not thought prudent to progress, but no part of this bill can be construed to be receding.

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1800.

Mr. G. did not think the measure would have any injurious effects, by preventing officers being procured when wanted. As many of these gentlemen, he believed, entered the army from the love of their pay as from the love of their country, and, between both, there never could be a deficiency of officers. He thought it perfectly easy for the Secretary of War to learn the individual circumstances of every gentleman in the army, so that none might be injured by the discharge, if a proper selection was made.

He did not know whether the construction put in the power of the President to appoint officers, if there should be occasion for the men, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MARSHALL,) was correct or not; but Mr. G. said he knew one thing—that if it was necessary, and a doubt existed upon it, an amendment could be made to the bill to remove that doubt, and therefore that was no objection to the motion now under consideration. From the return, it would appear that at present there was about one officer to seven non-commissioned officers and privates, upon the average. From this estimate it must appear that great numbers of these supernumeraries were useless, and if useless they ought not to be kept, especially since their places could be filled at any period when it might become necessary, and as they could have no claim beyond the period when their services became useful.

Mr. SMITH said, when the subject was before the House a few days past, some gentleman talked about a middle ground; he then thought one might be taken, he thought that the supernumerary officers might be sent home on furloughs; but, on farther reflection, he perceived that measure would be attended with considerable inconvenience, and but little convenience or saving. He thought it was best to let them remain at present with the army. He had obtained information from the proper officers, and learnt that by the middle of February some answer would most probably be received from France respecting the prospect of our negotiation. It would therefore be advisable to wait that issue. Mr. S. said, he recollected that, in the Revolutionary war, it took two months before the supernumerary officers got to their corps after they were called for; and as this must be attended with difficulty in urgent circumstances, it ought to be avoided, even at a trifling expense, for trifling it would be, should they afterwards be called upon.

The gentleman last up had not talked like a military man when he proposed the regiments should be concentrated at their several posts. This could not be done, but the trouble and expense of marching (which was very considerable) must occur if the motion were to pass. He feared if this amendment was introduced it would be worse than economy; he feared that a majority of the House would reject the bill, and he should regret that event, and on that account he was sorry the section was ever proposed.

Mr. RANDOLPH declared, that had it been his opinion the amendment would endanger the bill, he should not have offered it, or he would even now withdraw it. He professed himself a friend to the bill in its present shape, and if he could not get it amended in such a manner as to his ideas would be right, he would vote for it without; but he hoped gentlemen would see the amendment as proper, he was sure it would be found a saving measure. In the event of invasion (which gentlemen must mean when they talk about wanting these officers) will not the United States require these, and more? Nothing can be more clear. Then, certainly, while the selection would be making for others, it could also be for these.

It did not surprise him, Mr. R. said, that gentlemen who were inimical to the bill should also be opposed to the amendment; but it did surprise him that the friends of the bill were, because it appeared to him to be a part of the same measure. If the amendment was not to pass, there would be more officers than could be necessary for organizing the army. If the period should arrive and events occur by which they ought to be discharged, agreeably to the former bill, prior to this consolidation, they could as well be immediately discharged as though this provision had not been introduced, because there could be no more occasion for them, and therefore it was impossible this section could increase the expense.

Mr. HARPER said, there had been a mistaken opinion suggested—that the Executive had a considerable number of applications, and therefore could easily appoint any additional number of officers. That there were numerous applications was true, but the Secretary of War only made it his business to inquire respecting those gentlemen who were actually appointed; therefore, if new appointments were to be made, new inquiries must be entered into, as to character and a variety of circumstances necessary to make a judicious appointment. This must necessarily be, when it was considered that these appointments might precede the enlistments, which the peremptory necessity of the circumstances ought to hasten as much as possible. Mr. H. could not see the ground of the gentleman's surprise who was last up. A man might be willing to do something—he might be willing to go a mile, but might not wish to go four or five. But this appeared to surprise the honorable gentleman.

Mr. JONES said, he thought the other day that the twelve regiments were unnecessary, and therefore voted that they might be disbanded; he thought for the same reasons that the supernumerary officers were unnecessary, and that to discharge them would be a saving to the United States, which was a circumstance every gentleman ought to look to and endeavor to effect. His suspicions, he said, were more founded by the conduct and declarations of gentlemen who were generally hostile to measures which they supposed would cramp the Government. He feared the other day that these men were rather attached to a standing force than raised for a particular occasion. They were admitted not to be the provisional army—what were they then?—let gentlemen answer. It was farther stated to be necessary to keep up a regular force in order that the officers should acquire the art of war. How, by this establishment, would gentlemen expect this point could be effected? In some regiments there were not more than twenty or thirty men. What knowledge of military tactics or discipline could be acquired by exercising this very small number? There were more officers than men. He feared these were not the true reasons why the officers were preserved. There could be no want of them; no good could accrue from keeping them in pay, but much harm might. He therefore hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. SMILIE never apprehended invasion, but if such a thing was to occur, what effect would these officers have? He thought a good answer had been given to that question. As to the effect of this measure on the negotiation, it was folly to talk about it. Would the French be terrified from the attempt on account of these officers? Surely such an idea must be absurd, and yet the arguments of gentlemen went that length. He hoped the amendment and the bill would pass.

On the question the amendment was negatived.

The Committee then rose, reported the amendment to the House, and on motion the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 23.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal part of an act, entitled 'An act to mitigate or remit the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned,'" made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF ADDITIONAL ARMY LAW.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment reported, yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole, to whom was committed the bill to suspend part of the act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;" and the same being read, Mr. PLATT proposed a resolution that a further consideration of the bill should be postponed till the first Monday in December next.

Mr. BIRD wished to give his reasons for his vote on the present occasion, as he should probably be in the minority. When the motion for disbanding the army was before the House some days since, he did not rise, because the same principles which he maintained were supported with such great ability by several other gentlemen. But the same reasons which dictated his vote on that question, Mr. B. thought, would operate in favor of the present motion. He recapitulated some of the principal ideas advanced on the former occasion, particularly on the necessity of maintaining our defensive position, for which he thought there was as much occasion as ever. Having voted against that resolution, he thought it also consistent to vote against this bill, in whatever shape it came forward. There were certain cases in which not to go forward would be to go backward; this was one—here, not to do, was to undo. If a man undertook to build a house, and having carried it up to the roof, he was not to finish it, but let it remain in that state, it would be an evident display of his inability to complete it or of his folly in commencing the building. One or the other impressions would naturally strike the observer. So in respect to the army. It certainly was a feature of the national spirit; it certainly was a means of defence which was determined on by the national councils. To arrest its completion before the ground of its commencement was removed, must prove to observant France either imbecility or folly. And was it to be supposed she would make no use of it? She certainly would never so far depart from her usual policy. As he should be opposed to the bill in every shape, he should vote for the postponement.

Mr. HUGER said, though he agreed that the situation of the country did not authorize a reduction of the means of defence which were wisely ordered, yet he conceived there were good reasons why the present motion ought to be adopted. He did not believe that defensive measures had been or would be useless. He thought nothing more clear, than that the crisis of affairs was not so serious as it had been, and this he thought entirely owing to our defensive measures; their benefits had been received, but he wished not, on mere assurances of friendship, to recede from what he had done. What, he asked, had France done? She had done nothing which ought to produce a change in our measures, and therefore he voted against disbanding the army. She had to be sure wafted across the Atlantic a few fine soft words. Whatever their views, whether sincere or not, Mr. H. said, he would meet every proffer for accommodation, and therefore he approved highly of the measures taken by the Executive in sending Envoys. That amicable disposition ought to be seconded, by not increasing our means of defence. He could not be of the opinion with some gentleman, that it was the same thing to lay on our oars and remain statu quo, as to recede. He did not believe it was like a man, with his shield half raised and his club grasped, who on the first offer of accommodation from his adversary lays down his weapon and his shield, and meets the proffered, though it might prove deceitful, proposition unarmed. No, it was rather like the man who would still keep himself prepared, his shield still ready to avert the blow, though no less willing to meet amicable propositions. This, he believed, was what was desired by the Committee of Defence.

By preventing farther enlistments, the country would not be in a worse situation than at present. But by disbanding the army, or by discharging the officers, which he considered of the same nature, it would put the country in a worse situation, because it would prevent the means of progressing if there should be occasion. You show France and the world that you are willing to do anything you can towards peace and unanimity, but you will not trust to words; that while you hope for the best, you will remain prepared for the worst. It struck him, Mr. H. said, that there was something very amicable and conciliatory in this bill, and he therefore should vote for it, and against the proposition for its postponement.

Mr. NICHOLAS called the yeas and nays upon the question, which were agreed to be taken, and were—yeas 10, nays 82, as follows:

The said amendments were then again read, and, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A motion was then made and seconded further to amend the said bill, by adding the following as a new section:

"Be it further enacted, That the men now enlisted under the said act, shall be formed into as many regiments as they are sufficient to complete; to be officered, at the discretion of the President of the United States, out of the officers of the said twelve regiments; and that the supernumerary officers, together with such officers of the general staff, as, in his opinion, will not be necessary for the discipline of the said regiments, so to be formed as aforesaid, shall be discharged, and be entitled to receive, besides the allowance directed by law to be paid at their discharge, each one month's pay."

And, the question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it passed in the negative—yeas 38, nays 57, as follows.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress, for the information of the members, a report of the Secretary of State, of the ninth instant; a letter from Matthew Clarkson, Esq. to him, of the second; and a list of claims adjusted by the Commissioners, under the twenty-first article of our treaty with Spain. JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, Jan. 23, 1800.

The said Message, and papers accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE SEDITION LAW.

Mr. MACON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the second section of the act, passed the fourteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" ought to be repealed; and the offences therein specified shall remain punishable as at common law. Provided, that, upon any prosecution, it shall be lawful for the defendant to give in evidence, in his defence, the truth of the matter charged as a libel.

Mr. MACON said, though he was well convinced that the subject had been so fully discussed, both in this House in former sessions and elsewhere, that it would be impossible to add anything new, yet he thought it incumbent on him to offer his reasons for bringing the resolution before the House, which he would do in a few words.

He was so well convinced that no power was delegated by the Constitution of the United States to the Legislature to pass such a law, that the duty he owed his constituents, as well as his own opinion, impelled him, to make the motion to repeal the section at the present session. When the Constitution was before the State Conventions that adopted it, almost all the members who were in favor of it, in the States where the debates have been published, declared explicitly, that no power was granted to Congress whereby they could pass any law abridging the liberty of the press; those who were not in favor of the adoption at that time, thought it possible, some future day, Congress might assume the power by implication, and therefore it is that the conventions of the States generally recommended that an amendment should be made to the Constitution, declaring that no power over the press was granted to Congress by the Constitution. And the first Congress under the Constitution, in conformity to the wishes of their constituents, proposed several amendments to the Constitution, among them is one in the following words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." When this article was under consideration, it appears, by the debates which have been printed, that some of the then members of Congress thought it useless, because as no power was delegated on the subject, they could not then pass any law on any of the subjects mentioned in the article. This article, with others that will be read, has been ratified by the States and made a part of the Constitution, and removed all the doubts as to the power of Congress to pass any law on the subject of the press. If Congress can constitutionally pass the law now in question, can they not also pass a law to abridge the freedom of speech, to prevent the people from peaceably assembling to petition for a redress of grievances, and by the same arguments make an establishment of religion? But what means the freedom of the press? It must mean that, as there was no law existing to abridge it, that Congress should not thereafter pass one, and that it should remain exactly as the Government found it. But in order to make it more clear if possible, and to give more perfect satisfaction to the people, another amendment was introduced in the following words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Mr. M. said he conceived this clause was introduced to prevent any power being assumed by implication, and consequently that Congress have no power to pass any law, unless that power be specially granted, or absolutely necessary to carry a delegated power into effect. Again, the 11th amendment has these words—"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." From these clauses it appears quite clear that the law is a violation of the Constitution; if, however, it should be contended that the power to pass the law is delegated, or that it is necessary to carry any delegated power into execution, he hoped the gentlemen would put their finger on that part of the Constitution in which the power was granted; but he conceived that this could not be done now, no more than formerly, because no such clause was in the Constitution.

Mr. M. said it was not only fair, but perfectly consistent, with the Constitution, that every act of Government might be discussed either in the public prints or elsewhere, by any citizen; and what other means than the press could the people employ to disseminate their opinions, or of knowing the opinions of others? Besides all this, the law must have a very bad effect on our system of Government, if we mean to keep it pure by elections; if elections are to be free, the people ought to have the liberty of freely investigating the character, conduct, and ability of each candidate to fill any place of public trust whatever, and this cannot be done as long as the present law continues in force.

It has been said formerly on this floor, and perhaps it would now be made an objection to the motion, that there was a great difference between the liberty of the press and the abuse of the press. This may be true; but as no line of distinction has ever been drawn, so that we may know where the liberty of the press ends and the abuse begins, we may fairly conclude that it is impossible to draw the line. But if a line could be drawn, it would be of no consequence to us, because we are prohibited from legislating on the subject of the press by the Constitution. The press is amongst the best gifts bestowed on man, its benefits are incalculable, and if we had the power to touch it, prudence would dictate to us to do it with great caution; and here permit me to repeat, that we have no power over it, given by the Constitution of the United States.

A considerable argument in favor of the liberty of the press, if there was a necessity for one, might be derived from the old saying, that truth will always prevail. This Mr. M. said he firmly believed, and could not discover any reason for preventing a free investigation of all public acts; and if there are those in the country who hold different opinions, they ought to have the same means of supporting their opinions.

Another proof may be derived from the Constitution in favor of the opinion that the law is unconstitutional, it is that part which declares that the President and other officers may be impeached. This also shows the propriety of examining into the conduct of all officers, because it supposes that some one of them may commit a crime for which he ought to be impeached and punished. And if at any time, any officer liable to be impeached, should be guilty of malpractice in office, what so ready a way to make the discovery as a free and public investigation of his conduct? And yet the liberty to make this examination is considerably curtailed by the law, for in doing this it is more than probable that the hatred of the good people of the United States will be excited against such officer. Mr. M. said he hoped there never would be cause for anything of the kind, yet that was no reason why the means of making a discovery, in case it should happen, ought to be unlawful.

Mr. M. said he would not take up the time of the House any longer, and on these grounds would submit the subject to their decision, with the hope that the section would be repealed.

Mr. BAYARD, said he could not question the purity of the motives which induced the gentleman from North Carolina to introduce the resolution on the table, but it was difficult to discover a sufficient object for the renewal of a subject which had heretofore been so fully discussed and so often decided. The House would remember that the law which the resolution proposed to repeal, would expire by its own limitation on the 3d of March 1801; and judging from its past effects there was certainly nothing to dread from its continuance another year.

Mr. B. said he was not one of those who had ever had any scruples as to the constitutionality of the law or who ever felt alarm as to its operation. He knew that it had been made the instrument of much clamor, but there was no law so wholesome that party could not create a clamor against it. The law in question went no further than to punish acts which no one would be hardy enough to say ought not to be punished. It moderately chastised the author of a false and malicious libel, who employed falsehood maliciously to deceive the people as to the conduct of the officers of Government. It was no matter how wicked the motive of an author might be, provided his publication was true, nor was it material how groundless the publication was provided the motive was honest. It was the combination of wickedness and falsehood alone that was punished. And he would ask whether the nation had now anything to fear from the suppression of such a combination?

It was not his intention, Mr. B. said, to go into a dilated argument on the subject; he should however beg permission to notice some things which fell from the gentleman who moved the resolution before the House. The gentleman had urged what had often been said, that the law was unconstitutional. If this objection were clearly founded, the Legislature could not be in too much haste to repeal the law. But the enemies of the law must at least allow the point to be extremely doubtful; and considering in case the Legislature had erred, as to their power on the subject, the citizen who was injured might seek relief from the judiciary by contesting the validity of the law, there was the less occasion to adopt the resolution. If the act was unconstitutional it was no law; and, if no law, there was no occasion for the present interference of the Legislature.

It is insisted, by the gentleman from North Carolina, that the act is repugnant to the amendment to the Constitution which provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of the press. The gentleman himself had seen a wide difference between the liberty and licentiousness of the press, and he had endeavored to anticipate the distinction. It is said that no line can be drawn on the subject; that the shades are indiscriminable and that you cannot curb the licentiousness without wounding the liberty of the press. Nothing could be more fallacious than such reasoning. It applied with equal force to every human act which was punishable, because every act was equally susceptible of the shades of innocence and criminality. Crimes of the deepest dye, capitally punished, might be traced by a connexion scarcely perceptible to actions not only lawful but laudable. The act of homicide was graduated by the nicest lines, and according to the shades of the act it was commended, permitted, excused, or punished by the law. If the possibility of touching the liberty of the press were an objection to punishing the abuse of it, on the same principle the whole criminal code ought to be abolished. It was always possible that innocence might be the victim of a law designed against guilt. Many innocent persons had suffered, and even capitally, but this only proved the sad law of our nature, but too well known, humanum est errare.

Mr. B. said it was impossible for him to feel a difficulty on the point of distinguishing between the liberty and licentiousness of the press, when he thought the line was full and clearly defined by the law in question. Surely to say the press shall not be the vehicle of malicious falsehood, is not to restrain its just liberty. Will gentlemen say the Constitution meant to establish an empire of falsehood, or to prevent the erection of pillars of truth? Can the freedom of the press require the liberty to publish malicious lies? Can any one hesitate in saying that such a liberty would be licentiousness? The law had said no more. It has defined licentiousness to be the malicious publication of falsehood. And can it be said that the punishment of such an act restrains the just liberty of the press? Gentlemen could not suppose that the law was liable to be perverted to a different end. They would remember that its execution was placed in the same hands to which were trusted our properties and our lives. No man could suffer under the law, unless a jury of the country convicted him of the offence designed by the law. He might defend himself by the truth of his statements, or the purity of his motives, and the jury would not, and could not convict him but on the belief that with wicked intentions he had published what was false. With this protection what was to be feared? The honest citizen was secure, it was only the restless, ambitious, unprincipled disturber of the peace who had anything to dread.

The honorable gentleman had also relied upon that amendment to the Constitution which reserves to the States and the people the power not delegated to the United States. Mr. B. admitted that if the power was not delegated to the United States it could not be exercised by Congress.

But he insisted that the power was delegated. He found it in the last clause of the 18th section of the first article of the Constitution. By that clause Congress has power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." This clause expressly delegates a general power of self preservation. The right given to the Government to make laws proper for carrying into execution the powers delegated, necessarily carries with it the right to make laws proper to preserve and maintain the powers delegated, because the powers cannot be executed unless they are preserved. To preserve its powers the Government must certainly defend the foundation on which they rest. The Government of the United States is immediately bottomed on public opinion. It originates with the people and depends on their will for its existence, and on their arms for its protection. Poison the fountain of its being and the whole frame is palsied, and must sink into lethargy or die in convulsions. The Government is bound not to deceive the people, and it is equally bound not to suffer them to be deceived. Delusion leads to insurrection and rebellion, which it is the duty of the Government to prevent. This they cannot prevent unless they have a power to punish those who with wicked designs attempt to mislead the people. Sir, said Mr. B. for Government willingly or weakly to suffer the people to be misled, is to commit treason against them. It is our duty to defend them against deception, and when they are rightly informed, there is no doubt but, in their turn, they will defend the Government.

The gentleman from North Carolina, however, had said the truth needed not the aid of a law; that in the end it would always prevail against falsehood. This was a fine moral sentiment, but our limited knowledge of events did not verify it. There was scarcely a period of the world, at which the empire of falsehood was not as extensive as that of truth. The labor of truth was eternal, as fast as it vanquished one enemy another arose. Would the gentleman say the truth always prevails, when he looked to the state of our holy religion? Near 1800 years had elapsed since its light was abroad, and yet how large a portion of the world remained in darkness and error! If the sentiment, however, were true, it would not dispense with the propriety of the law. Though truth had power to prevail in the end, it was no reason why we should not assist it in the beginning. Were we called upon to be impartial between the principles of truth and falsehood, and to allow them to contend on an equal footing? Before the victory was obtained by truth it often happened that much mischief was done by falsehood. This was especially observable in political affairs. The law in question was enlisted in the service of truth, and designed solely to oppose her enemies.

Mr. B. said he had not risen with an intention of entering largely into the subject. He had been drawn further than he had designed to go, in answering observations which had fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina. His design was to vote against the resolution. He thought the law a wholesome one, and that it ought not to be repealed.

There was no modification of the resolution which would induce him to agree to it. But he thought it susceptible of amendment which would render it less exceptionable. Not knowing the event, he considered it as a duty to render the resolution as harmless as possible in case it should succeed. He should perhaps not disappoint the wish of the honorable gentleman who moved the resolution. It was certainly not the design of that gentleman to raise the floodgates of slander and defamation. His motive probably was a tenderness for the Constitution, which he might consider infringed by that law. The amendment he designed to propose would still hold out the terror of punishment to those who wickedly aspersed the members of the Government. The gentleman must often have observed in the public prints slanders the most flagitious and unfounded, designed to impair the confidence of the nation in officers of great trust, and whom we all knew to be equally faithful and zealous in the performance of their duty. Surely in such case it should be known that there was a power to punish. He should therefore move to amend the resolution by the following addition: "And the offences therein specified shall remain punishable as at common law; provided, that upon any prosecution it shall be lawful for the defendant to give in his defence the truth of the matters charged as a libel."

Mr. GALLATIN could not conceive what connexion the amendment, as it was called, had with the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. It in fact amounted to a complete substitute for that proposition. The motion was calculated to repeal a part of a law, but the amendment was calculated to establish an entirely different principle, in direct opposition to the intention of the mover—not only that a certain class of persons should be punishable at common law, but that they should "REMAIN" punishable at common law. This was certainly an independent proposition, and therefore improper to be coupled with it.

In the next place it was improper, inasmuch as it would go to revive a law which the motion went to repeal, and therefore, being to all intents a substitute for the original motion, could not be in order. Nor could the motion be of any use according to its own words. It provides that certain offences shall remain punishable at common law; this implies that they are already punishable in the courts of the United States, and if they are now punishable, there being no attempt to change the jurisdiction of the common law over them, it can be of no use to declare they shall remain so. The resolution goes to repeal a statute. Is it necessary then to say that a measure which goes to repeal a statute shall not go to repeal the common law? The common law remains of course. But if the amendment, or supposed amendment, goes to establish a kind of substitute, by maintaining the principle of the statute which was identically the same that the resolution was intended to destroy, it certainly must be out of order. Mr. G. appealed to the Chair.

The SPEAKER declared the amendment in order.

Mr. NICHOLAS said if the amendment meant anything, it certainly implied that these offences were now punishable at common law, by the expression "remain." For what then could the amendment be introduced? It could not be pretended that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina was calculated to repeal any part of the common law. If it was meant to declare what would be of course, it could have no operation at all. If the real design is not the apparent one, it is very evident that something farther is intended than the gentleman has acknowledged or

H. OF R.

Sedition Law.

the House is aware of, and can only operate as a trick to defeat any attempt to repeal the law, or to couple with it a provision much worse than all the provisions of the law. Something is meant to be adopted which is not now in existence, and which gentlemen do not wish to declare.

Were gentlemen prepared, Mr. N. asked, to bring into force in this country all the common law of England, and with it all the punishments and penalties there inflicted? He knew that this would be esteemed extremely useful and gratifying in one department of the Government, but it could not be done; he knew that there was too much wisdom in that House to admit of such a system, the danger of which was extremely evident.

If the motion was to introduce no new law or principle, it would be useless, but if it was to introduce a new law, or rather a new and essential principle, (of which he had no doubt,) an hundred more unknown but hidden ones would attend it, because the practice of another country would be introduced in all its rigor. This was done in a way which he conceived never could meet the assent of Congress—it covered under it so much more than it pretended—and which, whenever established, must have a serious effect. He therefore trusted it would be rejected.

Mr. BAYARD said, it was as little his intention as it could be his expectation to cover under plain words a design which no veil could have concealed from the eyes of the House. He did not know what the gentleman meant by a trick. But if he meant anything unfair, it was not justified by what had occurred on the occasion, and could be attributed only to a disposition which is ever ready to suspect what it is apt to practice. He had no hesitation in avowing that the amendment was predicated in the existence of the common law, and was not designed to introduce it. He had always been of opinion, nor could he suffer himself to doubt, that the common law existed under the Constitution of the United States. He had no doubt that those who wished to weaken the Government would maintain a different doctrine. Without the common law the Courts of the United States would be reduced to a cypher, and the other branches of the Government be stripped of that great defence which its institutions and principles afforded. Without recurring to the common law the Constitution could neither be explained nor executed. The judicial bill supposed it to exist, and the judges had pronounced its existence. He was informed that the question had been several times decided, and that all the judges united in opinion with the exception of one. It was a point proper for the judiciary to decide, and their decision was full evidence of the existence of the law. It might be in the power of Congress to unmake the law, but, after the judicial determination of the point, it was necessary for them to enact it.

Mr. B. could not conceive how the gentleman from Virginia could misunderstand the language of the amendment. The words were, that the offences specified in the act should remain punishable as at common law. Was it necessary to explain to the gentleman the meaning of the word remain? If the gentleman was not capable of understanding the word, Mr. B. said he certainly was not to blame, as it was in no degree ambiguous. But he hoped at least, that his express avowal that he considered the common law as existing, and that he considered the offences specified in the act as punishable at common law, would render him intelligible even to the gentleman from Virginia.

The principal design of the amendment was to ameliorate the common law. It was known that upon a public prosecution for libel, the truth of the matter charged as a libel was no defence. This doctrine he thought unrighteous in itself and inconsistent with political freedom. He could not consent that truth should be punished. It was important that the truth in politics should be known. He wished to circulate it, and support its credit, by punishing the impostures of falsehood, which frequently assumed its appearance. When the Sedition bill was before Congress, he had been governed by the same principle, and proposed an amendment to the same effect with the present, which was incorporated in the bill.

Mr. B. would only further observe, that in his opinion without a power to punish defamation a popular Government could not exist. It rests immediately on the opinion of the people. The public affection is the vital principle of the Government. Let that affection be alienated and the Administration is palsied. Not a law could be executed, not a measure could be supported. Must not the Government have the power of preserving itself? They who doubt this principle must wish it exterminated. It could not preserve itself without the power of punishing those atrocious and poisonous falsehoods, which unprincipled ambition and the violent spirit of party were ever ready to employ as means to accomplish their purposes.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) certainly did give the House to understand that he meant, by his amendment, to introduce a new principle: for he had asked whether the gentleman from North Carolina would leave the country without a law to inflict punishment on these offences; would he open the flood-gates to defamation and scandal? This certainly implied that there was no law to correct the evil: he had not then told the House that libels were already punishable at common law, by the Federal Courts. But afterwards he came forward and denied any design to introduce a new principle: he said that the common law was the law of this land.

Mr. G. did not understand the precise meaning of the gentleman. This was a principle so extremely extensive, and susceptible of so many meanings, that he presumed it impossible to be understood. If, as the gentleman said, the amendment conveyed no new idea, because the offence was already punishable at common law, what then did it mean? It must mean that it was not an amendment to the resolution, but an amendment to the common law, in order to effect the same object which the resolution first proposed went to repeal, and therefore it could not be in order, because one was in direct violation of the other. But the decision of the Chair had pronounced it in order.

Mr. G. suggested to the candor of the gentleman, whether it would not be better to make a distinct proposition of his motion. If the first motion is carried, it will be in his power at any time to propose any other he may think fit. An admission of the one will not prevent the subsequent admission of the other, but certainly the first ought to be the first in order. But to force the House into a debate, not on the principle of the first resolution but of a new one, viz: what would be the best substitute, or what would be the law, if this should be repealed, certainly was not consistent with his usual candor. This must necessarily puzzle the friends of the resolution as to what vote to give. The House were told that the judiciary, with one exception, had pronounced the common law of the land. Mr. G. wished to understand the assertion. Upon this broad and large construction of the judiciary, he would not hesitate to say that "we have no construction;" for if it was intended to say that certain species of offences, which had been recognised as offences by the common law (perhaps) of Great Britain, were within the jurisdiction of the judiciary of the United States, merely because they were offences at common law, it was clearly the same as setting aside at one stroke all the restrictions and limitations of power as expressed in the Constitution. It was giving to the judiciary a legislative power of adopting certain laws not enacted by Congress as the law of the land. Indeed it was giving a farther power: Congress had no power to legislate on any subject which was not specially granted to them by the Constitution; but, if the other doctrine was true, the judiciary could decide on subjects upon which Congress could not legislate.

But, Mr. C. asked, where did the judges get that power of making the common law the law of our land? Their power is limited; no department of the Government has a power to make laws but the Legislative, and if that idea is just, how can the judges assume an uncontrolled jurisdiction over all common law offences? The motion certainly argues that the judges have a power which it cannot be proved ever was given to them by the Constitution. He said he was not ready to meet this altogether new principle, in every point of view a subject of such magnitude merited: these ideas were drawn from him as the most prominent on the occasion.

When the Sedition law was proposed and adopted, was it brought up with a view of ameliorating the common law, because its severities for this species of crime were too hard? No, it was undoubtedly brought forward as a measure of defence. It was thought that there was no power in the judges to carry into effect such punishments as were thought by a majority essentially necessary to support the Government. It was therefore brought up as a part of the general defensive system. When a motion was made to repeal it during the last session, the committee appointed to report on the subject, did report on it as a part of the measures of defence against France, and therefore, in that state of things, thought it improper to repeal it. Nay, were not the arguments of the gentleman this day grounded on the necessity of the law being continued? What need of all this argument, and of what force would these opinions be if the crime was already punishable at common law? All these arguments would be fallacious, if the offence was already punishable at common law. This being a question of so novel a nature, Mr. G. presumed the House was not prepared to discuss it. Indeed it was one of so delicate a nature that it ought not to be admitted in a way wherein it could not be maturely discussed. If the offences are cognizable at common law, then the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina would leave the subject in the same situation as the gentleman from Delaware wanted to place it, but if they are not cognizable, the motion of the gentleman from Delaware would make them so. It is impossible to conceive that the latter gentleman could think his motion necessary, except it was to destroy the other motion, and if meant to destroy that, it ought not to be admitted as coupled with it.

Mr. HARPER said, whether the conduct of the gentleman from Delaware was candid or proper, the House could judge, but that there was neither a want of candor or of propriety evinced in the present proposition, he believed, must plainly appear; however, it did so to him. This method of introducing amendments was constantly the practice of the House; it would not be a novel practice to endeavor to make a thing better which was disapproved of. Mr. H. disapproved of the motion on the table; but, if it must pass, he certainly would wish it to pass in as unexceptionable a form as possible.

There appeared to him but two distinct propositions now before the House. One was, whether the common law, generally speaking, was the law of the land; and the other, whether these offences were punishable under the Constitution of the United States. These were entirely distinct. He did not consider it necessary to inquire, on the present subject, whether the common law was in force in the United States, or whether it was not; the only inquiry he thought was, whether the offence of libelling the Government was punishable in the United States without the aid of a statute. Of this he never had a doubt.

The Constitution provides that all offences under that Constitution, or the laws made in pursuance thereof, should be punished by the judiciary power. Now the law which our forefathers brought with them, and to secure which they shed their blood, is what is termed the common law; by this law it was punishable for any person to libel the Government, by fine and imprisonment. This law, therefore, is an affirmation of this common or universal law. If the subject matter exist, the law operates: if the Constitution of the United States gives birth to the subject matter, the offence is therefore punishable under that Constitution. When the Constitution created the Government,

H. OF R.

Sedition Law.

JANUARY, 1800.

it brought into existence the subject matter; the offence therefore arises under the Constitution, and in that view the judiciary power can punish libels against the Government of the United States.

With regard to the reasons why this law was introduced, the gentleman last up was mistaken, both as to facts and conclusions. He said that the reasons why the law was introduced were grounded on measures of defence, and that this was considered as a part of that system. Every other gentleman but him, Mr. H. said, knew that the reason was because there was a doubt entertained as to the applicability of the common law to this species of offence, and whether it could be punished under the Constitution or not. To remove these doubts the law was made—it was introduced as a declaratory act—an act to render a pre-existing fact notorious, and so express, that “he that runs may read it.”

Another object was to mitigate the undue rigor of the common law, and to give opportunity for the person charged to clear himself by proving the truth of his assertion. On this ground also the present amendment was introduced, and on this ground it is an amelioration to what would exist without it. It was true, that this law was passed about the same time of the adoption of the defensive measures, but the conclusion that this was one did not follow of course. Nor was it to be inferred, from the period at which it was passed, that no such offence existed independently of the act. If these things were true, there was an absolute necessity for the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, in order to declare what is the law of the land, as it stands, independent of the statute; and for another use, as observed before, to remove the severities of the penalty. It was not his desire, Mr. H. said, that the law should be repealed, but if it must, he wished it to be coupled with this provision.

Mr. SMITH concurred in the idea with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that this bill was certainly brought forward in connexion with measures of defence. The bill was first brought into the Senate in a very objectionable shape indeed, it was changed there, and underwent other alterations in the House. It was thought a measure essentially necessary, to guard against the treachery that was at that time apprehended from the French. Another proof of that principle was, that the bill was made to continue in force about the probable time that this necessity might arise. There was then no doubt of the connexion of the bill with the other measures of defence entered into at that period. It was clear, therefore, that the gentleman from South Carolina himself, and not the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was deficient in his recollection of the grounds on which the law was built.

Mr. NOTT moved, as the question was so materially changed by the last motion, and as it appeared to him to involve an important subject, that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House. He believed he was not singular in his wish; he was not prepared to give his vote, and supposed it must be the case with other gentlemen, on which account he wished it to receive every possible consideration.

The question for commitment was taken and negatived—49 to 41.

Mr. NICHOLAS confessed, notwithstanding the skill of the gentleman from South Carolina in enlightening his hearers, that his understanding was yet so dull that it was impossible for him to escape the imputation of ignorance from that gentleman. He considered this motion in no other light than as an affirmation of the common law, covered under the pretended modification of it. This appeared to be confessed in effect, though not openly. The gentleman from Delaware at first pointed out the danger to which he supposed the Government would be exposed by the flood of slanders opened on it by the motion first made, and yet the gentleman now says he only intended to ameliorate the common law, and not to introduce new restraints. He said farther, that he himself never had a doubt about the common law being the law of this country, but acknowledged there was a doubt in the judiciary about it. This was a proof that if it was not the established law, he wished it to be in force, and therefore, as there was some doubt about it, he proposed an affirmation of the principle. Let the gentleman endeavor to clear himself of that imputation as much as he pleases, it still was evidently his desire that the House should sanction the common law, which Mr. N. trusted they never would do.

Mr. N. said he should not pretend to go into an examination of what is meant by the common law; he confessed he could not do it; he did not know what it was, nor did he ever yet see a man who could explain it to him, or that pretended to do it. It was the first time that he had heard it said that the Sedition law was intended as a modification of the common law; he appealed to the debates of the period when the Sedition law passed; there was not a solitary opinion then given that the United States had such law as is now called the common law. He recollected, indeed, some gentlemen saying that it was a law in all the States, and thence argued that it was necessary the General Government should have similar restraints.

The gentleman from South Carolina, indeed, had endeavored to remove the difficulties in the way of the amendment, by calling it part of the universal law. This was quite a new term, and a new doctrine. Where he was to go to look for this law, he was more at a loss than before. Was it the practice of all nations, and was no Government to deviate from this universal law? It was not to the common law of England alone, then, that they were to affirm, but something yet more uncertain! But the gentleman pretended to prove it an offence under the Constitution. The Constitution indeed speaks of the offences under it, but defines a variety of crimes, more than enough to satisfy such an expression—treason for example is a crime, under the Constitution, the mode of punishment being left alone to the law. On the whole, whether the amendment is to be understood according to the gentleman's first explanation, as a substitute for the Sedition law, or according to his last explanation as an amelioration of the law of the land, it must deserve the name he had given it, a trick to effect more than the terms of it seemed to import.

JANUARY, 1800.

Sedition Law.

H. OF R.

Mr. ORRIS said, that the amendment proposed by his friend from Delaware was new to him when offered to the Chair. He was however astonished at the unwelcome reception which it had encountered. It appeared to him to be a most happy expedient for reconciling the views of the friends and opposers of the original act, and yet it affected some gentlemen with stronger abhorrence and apprehension than the law itself. The true state of facts relative to this subject he apprehended to be, that gentlemen on one side of the House maintained an opinion that libels against the Government were punishable by common law, and that the truth was no justification. On the other side it is believed that the common law is unknown to the Constitution, and the Sedition act, being a violation of the Constitution, ought to be repealed. The judicial courts of the United States are alone competent to decide this question. It is not to be expected that either party will recede from a belief of its own tenets. The amendment of the gentleman from Delaware is calculated to leave each in possession of its respective doctrine, and to guard against the mischiefs arising from either. He agrees that the act shall be repealed, and only requests that if, in that event, our opinion of the competency of the common law should be established by the proper tribunal, a man charged with writing a libel may be permitted to give in evidence the truth of his assertions. Wherein consisted the unfair design, or appearance of duplicity, charged upon this measure, he confessed that he could not perceive. It did not contain the affirmation of any new principle, unknown to the Constitution, and, if it did, it would be of no binding authority. It proceeded merely upon the supposition that the principles of the common law were recognised by the Constitution. If the assumption of this principle was erroneous, a court of law would decide against it; but if, on the other hand, it should happen to be sustained, would not the utility of a provision appear manifest, which should screen from punishment the author of a publication founded in truth.

Mr. O. observed, that in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who denied that the common law was recognised by the Constitution or the laws, he would venture the assertion, that the Constitution itself was not intelligible without the aid of definitions taken from the common law. In one section was contained an express allusion to trials at law, which could be satisfied by no other law than the common law. This construction had been retained in the act for establishing the judicial courts, which provides for trials at common law, in so many words. All our forms of trials and judicial proceedings, as well criminal as civil, are modelled upon and conducted conformably to the uses of the common law. He was at a loss to account for the repugnance entertained by some gentlemen to a law under which nearly every member of the House had been born and educated, and from which they derived a security for their titles to their estates, and for the principal rights of property and persons.

But gentlemen are pleased to declare their ignorance of the meaning of the words "common law." Do you mean, say they, the common law of England? Is that the law of this country? If not, how do you define and explain it? I will answer, said Mr. O., No! We mean not the law of England in its full extent. We know that a great part of that law does not apply to the nature of our Government or the circumstances of our country. But we mean so much of that law as, being applicable to the circumstances of this people, has been adopted into practice by constant and immemorial usage. It may indeed be pretended, that this law has been so variously modified in the different States, as entirely to destroy its uniformity, and consequently its relation to the whole people of America; but to this objection it was a plain answer, that the right of punishing all misdemeanors, which, being wrong in their own nature, had a tendency to destroy the Government, was inherent in the people of every State, and had never been relinquished by any of the United States. It was a principle of common law essential to the preservation of social order and of every Government under Heaven. It was the basis of the present Constitution; a birthright to which we should cling as a blessing, and a privilege, and not abjure as a curse. The reason which operated upon his mind in favor of the amendment, was what he had assigned; to secure the citizen from the rigor of the common law in this particular, if he should be found amenable to its jurisdiction.

The argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, that if the common law be unknown to the Constitution, this amendment will give it a sanction, and if it be a part of the Constitution the amendment is unnecessary. This argument may be retorted upon the gentleman. If the common law be a part of the Constitution the amendment will be nugatory and do no harm—but should it be otherwise decided, as it has already been in several cases by the Circuit Court, then the amendment will ameliorate the common law and prove highly beneficial.

Mr. MACON thought it the most extraordinary amendment that ever was tacked to a resolution. It meant neither more nor less when coupled with the resolution, than that the law ought to be repealed, and yet continued in force! If the common law was in force, and could punish the crimes, what reason could there be for declaring so by a statute? If it was not, he was not yet convinced that this would not establish it; he feared it would. The law in question was said not to be a measure of defence. In addition to what had been said on that subject, he referred to an observation of Mr. RUTLEDGE, a few days ago, in reference to the resolution now before the House: in recapitulating the measures of defence which he supposed some gentlemen wished to repeal, he mentioned this as one, and no doubt he thought it one.

Mr. HARTLEY was in hopes there would have been an open and candid discussion of the first motion; he conceived it would have a very good effect upon the minds of the people, who were dissatisfied with the law. He considered that more harm than good would attend this law, and therefore, as a question of policy, it would be best to repeal it. The few prosecutions which had taken place under it, he considered had tended to bring two or three individuals to public notice and consequence, who would otherwise have sunk into nothing, or never been known. He believed it was generally the opinion of the bench that the common law was in existence in this country, but that question had not fairly come before the House; he wished it had been made the subject of a distinct proposition, and not been so interwoven with what he considered entirely another subject. It would be remembered that last session, he had presented a petition from 1,700 of his constituents against this bill; paying some attention to their will, and doubting the propriety or policy of the law, he should vote for the repeal of the section proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, and against the amendment.

Mr. J. BROWN, in answer to the observation of Mr. HARTLEY, that he had presented a petition from 1,700 persons, against this bill, said that he presented one from 3,000, not one of whom, he would be bold to say, wished to have the act repealed.

The question was then taken upon the first part of the resolution in the words following:

Resolved, That the second section of the act passed the 14th July, 1798, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," ought to be repealed:

And carried in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 48, as follows:

Mr. LEE said the question was, at this moment, whether the House should say to the world that the councils of the United States possessed the means of legislative provision, or whether they did not—whether the American Government had not made a law upon a subject over which it possessed ample power to legislate? A manœuvre had been introduced to repeal a law, but by the rules of the House that manœuvre had completely turned against its friends, that part of the resolution having passed. Mr. L. was very happy an amendment had been introduced which enabled him to vote in a way to get rid of the deformity attending the original proposition, and at the same time to make the condition of the people better than it was under the law. He was one of those who believed that the common law was the law of this land, and therefore he was desirous of amending the proposition of the gentleman from Delaware to the one now passed. With that amendment he should be induced to vote for it, because it would ameliorate the common law; it would enable the accused to produce the truth (if truth existed) in his defence.

Mr. NICHOLAS conceived the common law was at its last push, and that if gentlemen, who were friends to it, could not get this, or some such provision, to support it, it was beginning to appear so monstrous that it never could be executed in this country. There might be found court after court who could give opinions in favor of its existence and force, but he should venture to say that public opinion must finally make them abandon the doctrine.

The principle proposed was recommended upon the ground that the accused might give the truth in evidence. He would venture to say that if this amendment was admitted, the accused would scarce ever be able to give the truth in evidence. Let the President or let the Congress act as corruptly as possible, let them do it as constantly as possible, it could not be proclaimed to the world; they were too secure under this provision, because what may be the truth, it might be impossible to produce in evidence. This was the amount of the doctrine. This view of it ought to deter the House from adopting so evil a principle.

As to gentlemen saying that this would leave the power precisely where it was, and would introduce nothing injurious, but on the contrary would operate to soften the rigor of the law, it was nothing but a specious provision, and unfounded reasoning, introduced to render a dangerous doctrine acceptable, and to make it go down the more unperceived. It certainly was calculated to give legislative sanction to the decision of the judges, so that if it was a wrong principle, in this instance, it would be more than a common wrong, and he hoped gentlemen would be so impressed with its evil tendencies as to vote against the motion.

Mr. DANA quoted the ordinance for the government of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, in 1787, to prove that common law was established in the American code, that people were entitled to common law jurisdiction, and it was considered as a valuable article. The government of the common law was repeatedly recognised, he said, in our courts of justice. But it was not confined to civil actions, as recognised by the 9th amendment to the Constitution, but in many instances extended to criminal actions. In the 10th amendment the article of bail was treated of, excessive bail was not to be required; the nature of bail was settled always by the usages of common law, and common law alone could say what was excessive bail. Again, I will say, that in a case where a new trial is required, no fact already examined shall be re-examined but by the rules of common law. Indeed the whole code was full of references to the existence of common law; every public record was drawn agreeably to common law usage. When he spoke of common law, Mr. D. said, he did not mean the common law of England, but he meant that part of the universal common law which was adopted by America, and which was become our common law. The common law jurisdiction being as well established as the Constitution, the laws, and the practice of our courts could make it, the amendment proposed could not be considered as introducing a new principle. On these grounds he should vote for it.

Mr. GALLATIN considered the observations of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Connecticut, as an answer to the objections made to the proposition as it respected the existence of common law. The principle that courts in their proceedings on subjects within their jurisdiction should be governed by the rules of common law, and adopt certain general definitions of common law, was very different from the principle that a certain class of offences which otherwise were not within their jurisdiction, should be cognizable by those courts merely because they were offences at common law. Let it be granted that the common law is recognised to a certain extent by the Constitution and laws of the United States, that it has been modified in the different States to suit their circumstances, and that it serves as a rule by which the judiciary is to be governed in their conduct upon questions on which by the Constitution and laws they have jurisdiction. But here we stop, and say that we do not wish, under color of common law jurisdiction, to give our sanction to a new species of power which the judiciary never have possessed, and which they cannot assume without it. This amendment declares that a species of offence, the jurisdiction of which does by the Constitution belong to the judiciary, does in effect belong to them by another power—that of common law. Thus the gentleman creates two Constitutions, that of the United States, and that of the common law? He admits two distinct sources whence our judges derive their authority.

It is certain that the doctrine now insisted on goes to erase from the Constitution all the limits by which the judiciary are bound. We say, that by the Constitution, the power of the judiciary is limited to certain prescribed bounds, and that they cannot go beyond those points, and therefore, as specific powers are given to them by the Constitution, they cannot have those powers increased or assume new powers; but does not this motion go to give a new series of powers to that department? Nay, does it not go to say that not only the offences now under consideration, but all those offences which, although not within their jurisdiction, are offences at common law, shall be cognizable by them? Mr. G. said he did not think it could be proper, upon a slight investigation, for the House at once to decide that this extensive and hitherto unknown jurisdiction should belong to the judges.

But why, Mr. G. asked, was the proposition now made? It could be for no other purpose than to defeat the resolution just adopted, and to re-enact a section which it had been just agreed to repeal. The second section says that certain offences shall be punished by the law itself in a certain manner—this it was agreed to repeal; but now came another motion forward, to say with the same breath that these same offences should be punished, but in a different manner. Why is this alteration in the mode of punishment? It must be because one is preferable to the other. But what is the punishment the common law inflicts? If he mistook not, the punishment enacted by common law was more discretionary or more penal than what was now proposed to be repealed. Fine and imprisonment, without limitation of even pillory, were the common law punishments. Therefore, the gentleman who made the original motion and the friends of that motion were now called upon to adopt a principle more hateful, in their opinion, than the one they had just voted to repeal. Mr. G. said he would much rather have the present law continue in existence than that the common law should be substituted, because the punishment inflicted by common law was greater and more arbitrary, and because the law would soon expire, whilst the amendment rendered the doctrine of common law perpetual.

Those gentlemen who wished to repeal the law as it now stands, did it with a view of substituting something better and not something worse, but if they were to agree to their own motion, accompanied by that of the gentleman from Delaware, a worse and perpetual law would be substituted for a temporary one, and therefore they would be compelled to vote against both, when connected. As it was clear, therefore, that the second motion would inevitably defeat the first, he hoped those who voted for the one would vote against the other.

Mr. HARPER observed, that all the gentlemen who had spoken to these motions constantly recurred to the same misconception with which they set out. The question was not, as gentlemen had treated it, to know whether the judges were to have a power delegated to them by this law which was not given them by the Constitution; but the real question was whether the offences herein detailed were punishable under, and by the Constitution? In the discussion of it they said there was no common law in the United States; or, however, to clear themselves of what they could not get out of otherwise, they called it all a mere matter of form!

Mr. H. would ask them whether the rules of evidence was a matter of form? Suppose for instance a criminal trial was brought on in one of the courts; in a case of life or death: the evidence in that case must be given and accepted upon rules of common law—would gentlemen call this only a matter of form! If they would, common sense must revolt at their judgment. Suppose a case of murder—the legal definition of murder must be known, and could only be known upon common law principles. Where would you go to find it? Not to the Constitution, nor to our statute books, but to Hawkins; there is its definition, and that is common law. Suppose the inquiry be, what is the law on the rule of deficit; where would you find what are the rules? You must go to Blackstone's Commentaries. These are important questions, and are only soluble on common law principles. So it is with all rules of law, and yet, however important, there is to be no common law, agreeably to these gentlemen's opinions. If, then, there is such a thing as common law, if it is recognised in any court of the United States and in all the State courts, and their whole practice is built on it; if it goes to life, to limb, and to reputation; if its use among us is without limits; where are gentlemen's arguments? How can they refuse to recognise a thing which necessarily is in continual existence whether they do it or not?

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's amendment and carried—yeas 51, nays 47—in the following words, after Mr. MACON's motion:

"And the offences therein specified shall remain punishable at common law; provided, that, upon any prosecution, it shall be lawful for the defendant to give in evidence, for his defence, the truth of the matter charged as a libel."

The following are the yeas and nays upon the amendment:

Some discussion here took place on the point of order, as to taking the question on the whole resolution as amended; with some gentlemen, and with the Speaker, it appearing that if both parts of the resolution were carried, of course the whole was; on the other hand it was suggested as unfair to force an amendment on an original resolution which destroyed its whole effect, and substituted a worse principle, on which account they wished to vote against the whole.

Mr. OTIS relieved the House from the embarrassment by moving the question on the whole resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to express his reasons for the vote he was about to give. He was sorry this extraordinary measure had been used to prevent the question being taken in the way it ought to have been. If the friends of the original motion were now to vote for it, it would put the liberties of the people upon an infinitely worse footing than at present. The question ought to have been, simply, whether the House would repeal an obnoxious act? But it seemed to have been changed so as to be, whether the House would place offenders under that law in a worse situation than before? Those who were even enemies to the law as it now stood, could not hesitate to vote for the preservation of a law they disliked. Mr. R. disliked the law in question because it was unconstitutional, and because it was inexpedient. Were the first objection out of the question, the latter alone would be important. Those gentlemen who had witnessed the impression this law made on the public mind could not avoid being earnest for its repeal, but however earnest, he never could agree to substitute a worse for it.

Though some gentlemen seem to think that the parts were the same as the whole, and though it might be self-evident in mathematics, yet it certainly was not always so in morals, nor in politics. This question, taken in its aggregate form, was as foreign to that originally proposed as was possible. Mr. R. said, so far was he from wishing to subject the people of the United States to what was called common law usage in this country, so far was he from declaring a power to exist where the Constitution had not placed it, that, as much as he disliked the Sedition law and much as he approved a motion for its repeal, he should vote against it in this dangerous shape, and hoped gentlemen who had entertained the same dislike to it would act in a similar manner, and not be carried away with the fair pretence of amelioration, so much talked about—a mere evasion of the merits of the resolution. These were the reasons which would influence him to reject the resolution in turn.

Mr. SMILIE also rose to give his reasons, to a similar effect. He never could agree to make an offence felony for which he considered the penalties of fine and imprisonment too severe. The common law would at once make libels felony. He hoped the resolution would be unanimously rejected.

Mr. EGGLESTON said, by voting against the resolution, the present law expires in March, 1801, but if the common law was adopted it was a sore which would never wear away, and a sore much worse in its nature than the law now in force, hateful as it was.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS was sorry to see gentlemen plume themselves and appear to take advantage of what no rules of propriety could approve, to wit, the snare they had brought gentlemen into. For himself, though the motion went very far, he would not vote against a resolution he so much admired; on that account, merely, he would give it his vote to prove his approbation of the principle. The reason he should vote for it was also because it would still leave a power in gentlemen, when the bill came into the House, to move to strike out the part which they disapproved of. Seeing it within the power of the House, it could do no mischief in the shape of a resolution.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the motion as originally proposed, and decided in the negative—yeas 11 nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, George Baer, John Dennis, Thomas Evans, Benjamin Huger, Henry Lee, Abraham Nott, Josiah Parker, Leven Powell, George Thatcher, and Robert Williams.

FRIDAY, January 24.

An engrossed bill to suspend part of the act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," was read the third time and passed.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory between the Sciota and Little Miami rivers, was presented to the House and read, praying that a tract of land sufficient to erect and endow an academy, for the benefit of the settlers between the said rivers, may be granted by Congress.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the law providing for the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the Ohio.

Mr. HILL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the thirteenth instant, a motion for authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to procure and transmit to the Governor of the State of North Carolina, a number of the copies of the laws of the United States, made a report, in the words following, to wit:

"That the committee are informed by the Secretary of State that, in pursuance of the act mentioned in said resolution, he had transmitted to Wilmington, in the said State, the number of copies of the said laws directed by said act, for the use of citizens in North Carolina; that the same was there stored, and were all consumed in the fire which destroyed the town of Wilmington. The Secretary has further informed the committee, that he is possessed of a number of copies of the laws, equal to the supply proposed by said resolution: It is, therefore, the opinion of the committee that the following resolution ought to be adopted, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure and transmit to the Governor of the State of North Carolina, a number of the copies of the laws of the United States, equal to the number which the Secretary was heretofore authorized to transmit to the Governor of the said State, by an act, entitled "An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States," to be deposited and distributed agreeably to the provisions of the said act, for the use and information of the citizens of the United States within the said State.

The question was then taken that the House do agree to the said resolution, and resolved in the affirmative.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee, made the twentieth instant, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, together with a letter from JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr., a member of this House for the State of Virginia.

Mr. SMITH moved a recommitment of the report. He observed that he could not otherwise get at the report, which he considered a very extraordinary and improper one. He was of opinion that the committee had gone far beyond the line of their duty, and the instructions given to them. They had suffered themselves to make reflections on a gentleman who complained of a breach of privilege, and insult offered to him. They had reflected on that gentleman both for his mode of application and for the style he had used. He considered that every gentleman had a right to address himself in what style he pleased, and he could not discover the authority by which that committee should censure it. Every man might not think proper to address the President in the way Mr. Randolph had done, but that could be no ground for reflecting on his peculiar mode of address. Considering the second paragraph of the report a deviation from their powers by the committee, he hoped the House were not disposed to sanction that impropriety.

After a few words from Mr. RUTLEDGE,

Mr. NICHOLAS said, as the committee had proceeded in the manner they had, if the House disapproved of their conduct, it would be necessary to recommit the report; for they had given many opinions unconnected with the resolutions submitted to the House, and, according to our rules, the resolutions alone are subject to alteration or amendment. For himself, he would say that he disapproved of almost every opinion the committee had given. He would beg leave to state his reasons at large for differing with them.

The House and committee appeared to have had but one opinion on the subject of the complaint being sufficient for our cognizance. The House, with the exception of Mr. Randolph himself, had determined on this principle when the President's Message was received, and the committee admit that the case would have been sufficient for the House to have acted upon, if the conduct of the officers in these instances, which were not of themselves equivocal, had not, as they say, been satisfactorily explained. The design of the actions charged on the officers is therefore the great object of inquiry.

Mr. N. said he could not conceive a clearer truth than that conduct towards a member of this House on account of the manner in which he has acted in it, calculated to provoke a quarrel and affray, ought to be considered in the same light as an immediate attack on his person; and yet he was very apprehensive that the decision of the committee on this admitted principle went to destroy it, and that, so far from giving security to the freedom of debate, it would go a great way towards its destruction.

In examining into the design of the conduct charged on the officers, Mr. N. said he would not trouble the House with a recital of all the testimony, as the course of the transaction must be fully in the recollection of members, although it contains throughout very strong evidence of the intention which is charged on them, but should confine himself to those circumstances which afforded positive evidence of the design to insult Mr. Randolph, and to put him under a necessity of representing their conduct.

Mr. Christie, who was, as Mr. N. understood, in a situation to hear more than any other gentleman present, except Mr. Van Rensselaer, whose deposition had not been taken, tells us that he was prevented from leaving the theatre by the strong impression which the conduct of the officers made on him before the particular facts he has stated took place; it convincing him that some riot would probably happen. He tells you that before they came into the box where Mr. Randolph and the other members were sitting, he heard the words mercenaries and raggamuffins used, and heard somebody say to Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds, "he does not hear you; go nearer;" and that upon this they came into the box where Mr. Randolph sat and carried on constant conversation in the same style. If Mr. Christie deserves credit, what doubt can there be of the intention? Captain McKnight called out to Captain Taylor, in another box, "these are Virginia raggamuffins." Can there be any doubt that this was intended to irritate some person belonging to that State? Talking of the discipline of the men exhibited on the stage, one of the officers said, "these raggamuffins are not well drilled, but will be better by another session of Congress." Mr. N. said he should be glad to hear what gentlemen understand by this but a comment on the proceedings of this House, which was meant for the members present, and particularly the member who had used the term raggamuffin? To these positive proofs of intention he would add the impression made on gentlemen present. He perceived, indeed, that for some cause (he could not tell what, for he did not entertain a doubt that the opinion of the persons present was necessary and proper evidence in this case) the gentlemen had endeavored to avoid giving opinions; but the course of the transaction has disclosed their impressions as completely as they could have been expressed. We find them rallying round Mr. Randolph in expectation of outrage. It is the most indubitable evidence of opinion, that he acts in the way the opinion would require.

Mr. N. said it was here proper to remark on an omission in the committee, which had very probably lessened the amount of testimony, and which of itself, if there was no other reason for it, should induce the recommitment of this report; that was the want of a regular examination of Mr. Randolph under oath. We find in the papers presented a general statement from Mr. R. barely glancing at the transaction, not sworn to, and of course entitled only to the same degree of credit in the House, and the world, which will be given to the statements of Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds. He could hardly suppose the committee doubted of Mr. Randolph's competency as a witness, for a decision against his admission would establish that outrages on members when alone and unprotected should be exempt from punishment. He did not suppose there were any circumstances in this case which could be supposed to lessen the usual respectability of that gentleman's testimony, for he had, so far from soliciting the present investigation, shown himself decidedly opposed to the House commencing it, and he was a perfect stranger to the officers in question, except in the impressions they made on him in the instance to which his testimony would relate. It will appear, when Captain McKnight's information comes to be examined, that a more minute examination of Mr. Randolph was absolutely necessary.

The committee have said that the part of these officers' conduct which was not too equivocal to be acted on by the House has been satisfactorily explained. Mr. N. said he had looked in vain throughout the testimony for the explanation; he found neither contradiction of facts nor denial of intention. He would run over the statements of these officers and the evidences of their witnesses to show that they contained nothing material.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

It was to be remarked that the statements of the officers themselves were not evidence in their favor, though they might be against them; but, admitting them to have the utmost force, they will be found to furnish great evidence of the truth of the charges; for they do not deny the truth of the actions themselves, or the intention which is inferred from them; they deny that they went to the theatre with the intention of insulting Mr. R.; this is by no means necessary to make them guilty, a design taken up then is quite equal; it is not even suspected that they did, for Mr. R. was at the theatre for the first time, and entirely by accident. The only fact denied by Captain McKnight is his rudely sitting down by Mr. R., which is proved by some of the gentlemen. But this is of little consequence. Captain McKnight speaks of an effort at leaving the box to clear himself a passage, and perhaps means this as an explanation of what Mr. Randolph considered as a jerk by his coat; but it is to be observed that he does not deny the act charged by Mr. Randolph. Here, Mr. N. said, may be observed the necessity of a more minute and authenticated examination of Mr. Randolph. The act charged by him and the one stated by Mr. McKnight (if it is at all to be considered as an explanation) are of such different natures that a witness could be at no loss in determining with certainty which it was. One circumstance was remarkable in Captain McKnight's statement: he must have been absent at the time of the debate on the army, and has given an account of the manner of filling up his time after his return till the affair at the theatre, so as to show that he could not have had any concert in this business; but Captain McKnight shows, by the constant repeated use of the words which fell from Mr. R. in the debate, that he had been fully charged with the subject before he went to the theatre; and yet his history of himself gives no account of this important occurrence.

Lieutenant Reynolds admits that Mr. Randolph was the subject of conversation while they were in the adjoining box, and that he had been pointed out to them—a very strong confirmation of Mr. Christie's testimony and of the design of insulting Mr. R. when they went into the box with him.

Mr. Thompson only proves that there could be no concert before going to the play; his testimony is negative in everything else.

Mr. Hurst proves nothing but that Mr. Randolph was the subject of conversation, and was pointed out while the officers sat in the other box.

Mr. Taylor proves nothing. He shows the manner of leaving the box, and that there was possibly occasion for Captain McKnight throwing himself forward; but does not pretend to have seen him so as to know that he did not take hold of Mr. Randolph. He says he knows of no concert. It will be proper to remark, once for all, that evidence of concert was not to be expected from persons who formed part of the company of these officers. If the concert was made, and they, knowing it, gave their countenance to the execution even by their presence, they were to all events and purposes parties. The question, therefore, could not properly be asked of them, and voluntary testimony on the subject is entitled to no weight.

Mr. N. said again, that, after running over the statements and evidence, he could neither discover explanation by testimony nor denial by the parties. Under such circumstances he confessed he felt alarmed at the decision of the committee, which in his mind amounted to a declaration that as long as it was possible to doubt that actions like these were meant to produce a quarrel, they should meet no censure. It was the same as saying that insults, which must always partake of uncertainty, if there is any in the present case, should be the reward of our public labors.

But it is surprising, said Mr. N., that the same committee who have been found so incredulous with respect to the conduct of these officers, should have caught so eagerly at a supposed misconduct in Mr. Randolph. They have in general terms censured the style of Mr. Randolph's letter to the President. It were to be wished that they had shown in what its impropriety consists. He said he was utterly ignorant on such subjects; he knew of no standard for official communications. In all probability, persons writing to the President adopted styles suited to their object. Men who want places would use one; those who were in familiar friendship with him would use another; and so according to all the varieties of situation. He knew of nothing necessary but the decency which is to be observed throughout society, and he saw no violation of this. When gentlemen would be pleased to tell what they consider as censurable, it may be answered. It is but an ill omen to exhibit such anxiety about official address, and so much indifference to freedom of debate.

But Mr. R. is censured for betraying the privileges of the House, by calling on the President to defend them. It is to be observed that this is no denial of the power of the House to protect themselves. It might have proceeded from a principle, which I think correct, that the House should not take up questions of privilege but on great and important occasions. We take our prejudices on this subject from a country where there is a natural hostility between the departments of Government, and where, of course, an ever-waking jealousy is proper; but we have not the same necessity for being constantly on the watch. Nobody will deny that if an outrage is committed by the military the President ought to take notice of it, and it may well be presumed that if the present case was of a nature to demand punishment that the House would address the President on it. There is no doubt either that the President would think the case aggravated where an outrage was committed, by its being committed against a member for an act of duty here. If these things are admitted, Mr. Randolph's application only gives information of what the President's duty requires him to act on; and so the President himself thinks, as appears by his Message to Congress. As well might it be said that if these officers had proceeded to a battery, it would have derogated from the rights of the House to have applied to the civil magistrate. The same act may be cognizable by different persons in different points of view, and it is no denial of the power of the other to, apply only to one. It is remarkable that the committee should be such sticklers for a power which they are so unwilling to use; that they should censure Mr. Randolph for not applying to the House, when they treat the case so lightly after they get possession of it. It would seem that they mean rather to acquire dominion than give protection, and that, by prohibiting applications to other departments, they would bring on complete subjection to the power here.

Mr. N. had stated his opinion fairly and honestly, and should conclude with repeating what he had said at first, that the committee were in no way warranted in making such a report. As it was the first instance of the kind, and had been attended with no serious consequences, as the officers were young men, who were probably ardent in support of their profession, he wished for nothing like punishment, or that more notice should be taken of it than would discourage such conduct in future.

Mr. BAYARD said, that the committee who had made the report then under consideration, had endeavored to execute with equal candor and fidelity, the unpleasant task which had been assigned to them. The subject was of the most delicate nature, involving the personal feelings of a member of the House, the privileges of this body, and the respect due to the first Magistrate of the United States. The committee had been the more embarrassed in being obliged to decide facts arising from evidence of different tendency, before they could form the conclusions contained in the report. Their industry had been unremitting in endeavoring to collect all the light which the testimony of witnesses could furnish.

When the committee had the depositions under consideration, it was very manifest that different gentlemen had seen with different eyes. The circumstances which had occurred, to some were wholly unsuspecting, to others were pregnant with designed insult. This was not remarkable, it was in the nature of things; circumstances naturally equivocal always enabled persons of different sentiments to draw various inferences. The committee had thought that in resting principally upon the facts stated, and discarding the coloring which arose from the impressions of different gentlemen they took the surest ground upon which their decision could be founded. He was confident that a liberal and accurate investigation of the testimony upon the principle stated, would maintain the propriety of the report which had been made.

The motion now before the House was to recommit the report. He would beg the attention of the House in considering the grounds on which the motion was supported. It was said that the committee had unjustifiably censured the style of Mr. Randolph's letter to the President. It did not appear to him that the committee had done so. They had only expressed a regret that Mr. Randolph should have felt himself justifiable in departing from the usual forms of decorum observed in official communications. No one could doubt, but Mr. Randolph had departed from those forms. The committee did not undertake to say that Mr. Randolph on any other person had not a right to express themselves in the style they thought most eligible. But if the style adopted departed from that which was usual, the fact of departure and its tendencies became matter of observation. The fact in the present case was undeniable, and the committee had only expressed their regret. They did believe that the accustomed forms of civility, in official communications, were often useful in softening the harshness of discordant sentiments, and generally productive of conciliation and good will. Preserving, therefore, the approved usages of time, the precedents of our forefathers, they could not do less than regret an innovation which promised no good and destroyed what had been found beneficial.

It had been further said that the committee had transgressed their powers, in expressing any opinion on the style of Mr. Randolph's letter, because it was a matter not referred to them. The Message of the President, said Mr. B., was certainly referred; and in that Message the President has called the attention of the House, to the style of the letter as strongly as the respect which he owed to his own character would allow. Why should the President have noticed the style of the letter, if he had no intention of turning the attention of the House to it? As it was a subject of remark in the Message, and as the Message had been referred to the committee, they would have been wanting in the respect due to the Chief Magistrate if they had passed the matter over in silence. The committee certainly did not approve the style of the letter—they intended to be so understood, without having it supposed that they undertook to pass a censure. Upon the point in question Mr. Randolph had his opinion, which was to be collected from his letter. The committee had a different opinion, and they considered it a duty to express it. Mr. B. observed that he admitted the right which belonged to every one to employ the style which he preferred in the expression of his opinions, but still he might be allowed to remark, that where an individual undertook to discard the terms of respect which custom had long connected with office and station, it was difficult to avoid inferring something more than a negative intention. He had no wish to press this subject. The committee had passed it over as lightly as possible, and for his part he should leave it to the private reflections of the House.

It had been stated that the committee had neglected to obtain all the evidences in their power, and the name of Mr. Van Rensselaer had been mentioned as a material witness who had not been examined. It ought to be known that Mr. Van Rensselaer had left the city before the committee was appointed. And considering the impatience of the House as well as of the public to have the business brought before them, they would not have been excused had they delayed their report till the testimony of Mr. Van Rensselaer could have been obtained from Albany.

But it had been made a mighty objection, and relied on as sufficient for the recommitment, that Mr. Randolph's statement had not been taken under oath. This objection, he said, arose from want of information on the part of the gentleman who made it. Early in the business Mr. R. had been applied to, in the same manner as other gentlemen. From motives of delicacy Mr. R. had declined appearing as a witness in the affair. This expressly appeared from the statement which he had furnished. Mr. R. afterwards delivered in his statement. This was not till Saturday. It was the design of the committee to convert it into a deposition. For that purpose, on Monday, the Chairman searched for Mr. R. It happened that he did not find him. And it had been declared and was expected that the report would be made on that day. It was therefore a mere accident, not avoidable by the committee, that the statement did not appear in the form of an affidavit. On this subject, said Mr. B., the committee were not ignorant of the rules which should direct them. They knew that Mr. Randolph was a competent witness in the case. But he would take the liberty of remarking that he was at a loss to discover how the gentleman from Virginia, who had raised the objection, had been able to determine that the testimony of Mr. Randolph was competent; there was certainly no statute of the United States containing any provision on the subject. And according to the doctrine of that gentleman the common law was not the law of the land. From what source the gentleman had derived his opinion he was much at a loss to know. For his own part, he had no doubt on the point, because, believing in the existence of the common law, by its rules he discerned the competency of the testimony. He confessed he was curious to know on what ground the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia was built.

But, said Mr. B., the objection on this subject is easily removed. None of us had any doubt that Mr. Randolph would have sworn to the statement of facts which he made. We are now willing to allow it the weight of a deposition. He did not mean to question the truth of the statement. He should treat it with the same respect as if sanctioned by an oath. But there were few facts which were proved by it or any part of the evidence. It had been insisted on as a reason for recommitting the report, that in the manner it was framed the House were confined to the resolutions which were offered, and precluded from passing their opinions and sentiments, expressly, in the preamble by the committee. Mr. B. did not perceive the force of this objection; the sentiments alluded to were simply the sentiments of the committee, according to the common forms of proceeding—the House had nothing to do with them. They went out to the world only as the opinions of the committee, and were not supposed to have been adopted by the House. The resolutions alone were the act of the House, and they were subject to modification. It certainly would be understood that the rest had no other ground than the judgment of the committee.

Mr. B. said he would now turn to another subject, and, following the example of the gentleman from Virginia, would enter into an examination of the evidence upon the table in order to ascertain how far it supported the report which had been made. He would first observe that he never had doubted, that it was a breach of privilege to offer any wrong or insult to a member for what he had said in his place, though it were done beyond the walls of the House. He believed that this doctrine was essential to the freedom of debate. But, in the present instance, his opinion had been determined by the case which resulted from the facts which had been proved. It had been urged that the opinions of the gentleman who were present at the occurrence at the theatre ought to have been considered as evidence by the committee. He differed from this opinion of the gentleman from Virginia. The impressions of those gentlemen were entitled to respect, but they could not prevent the natural inferences which the facts afforded. The committee were necessarily led to consider themselves in the nature of a judicial tribunal. Their inquiry was not explained. There was a justice due to the party accused as well as to the party complaining. The scales of justice are to be held with an impartial hand. Private sentiments and impressions existed on both sides and were very opposite. The committee therefore were driven to the facts of the case, as the only sure ground on which they could bottom their judgment.

Mr. B. said that certainly many circumstances occurred at the theatre which justified the suspicions of the gentlemen that an insult was intended to Mr. Randolph. Those circumstances however had been found capable of explanation, or so equivocal or trivial in their nature as not, in the opinion of the committee, to warrant the interference of the House.

Mr. B. said he would first take up the statement of Mr. Randolph, and he apprehended that upon a just examination it would be found to contain few material facts. He said the committee had certainly erred, unless they were justifiable in drawing a marked line of distinction between the knowledge which the witnesses had of facts and the inferences which they themselves had drawn from them. The minds of the gentlemen had manifestly been filled with suspicion, which had deeply tinctured their views of every occurrence which took place. He meant no censure upon the gentlemen; nothing was more common or more in the course of nature. But the committee had the more occasion to be guarded in order to avoid catching the same spirit.

The first fact stated by Mr. Randolph was "repeated allusions to what passed in the House of Representatives, during the debate of the preceding day, and a frequent repetition of some words which fell from him during the discussion." Mr.

H. OF R.

Breach of Privilege.

JANUARY, 1800.

B. observed that it did not clearly appear that those words were repeated with a design to insult Mr. Randolph. The conduct of the officers had been unexceptionable till that part of the exhibition which introduced a procession of persons in the habit of Turks. The words ragamuffin and mercenary, to which the gentleman from Virginia had given currency, were then first made use of. The allusion was natural, and had not the aspect of premeditation. If the officers had harbored an intention to insult Mr. Randolph, they would hardly have waited for an occasion they probably did not know would arrive, and which was less calculated than any other to accomplish their object.

The words in question had derived so much importance from the use the gentleman had made of them, that they had become the common cant of every tavern and street in the town. He had heard them frequently applied, certainly not with a view to Mr. Randolph, but from some little spirit of humor. But, said Mr. B., a question will remain—supposing the words made use of, with all the aggravation attributed to them—whether they amount to a breach of privilege. This question perhaps involved considerations different from any imagined by the gentlemen opposed to him.

Were they prepared to say that words alone amounted to a breach of privilege? If so, he thought it somewhat strange that the House had so tamely endured the breaches of their privileges which for years past had been committed, in newspaper publications. Nothing was more notorious than that the words used by gentlemen in the course of debate, had been introduced into papers, and commented upon and villified in terms of the most slanderous abuse. Need he refer gentlemen to pages of the Aurora, stained with the blackest scandal? Need he cite from it instances in which his friend from South Carolina, and other gentlemen, having been so happy or so unfortunate as to express some strong ideas, their opinions and words were made for months and years the theme of invective and opprobrium? Were not the motives of gentlemen also frequently arraigned and blackened with whatever calumny or falsehood could invent? He was aware that some gentlemen would say that these publications were different in their nature from words used in the presence of a person. Certainly there was no difference in the intention of using them, and, as to the effect, it was more pernicious in the former than in the latter case. Words uttered perished in the expression of them, or remained only in the memory of a few persons, but words printed were durable, and, in the vehicle of a newspaper, were circulated far and wide. But at any rate the distinction alluded to could only exist in the case where words were so applied that an instant notice of them was unavoidable, which was not so in the present case. Mr. Randolph had with a very laudable discretion avoided the least notice of them. It might have been designed that he should hear them, but there was no principle which called upon him to notice them. Mr. B. could not discern the difference between the cases of words generally uttered with an intention they should be heard, and words published with an intention they should be seen. The obligation to resent the affront, was not greater in one case than in the other. An extreme case might be put of words so applied as to leave no alternative but violence, and, if such had been the present case, he should have entertained an opinion different from that expressed in the report.

The next fact stated by Mr. Randolph is the act of Lieutenant Reynolds, suddenly dropping on the bench on which he was seated, in such a manner as to cause a concussion of their hips, and to occasion on his part a slight degree of pain. It would not be supposed that he meant to justify this conduct. In any point of view it was rude and inexcusable. But it could not be an object of much consideration with the committee, without being clearly combined with an intention to insult. Such an intention did not manifestly appear. Mr. Randolph himself was not assured of it. He did infer it, but with doubt, because there was no apology. If Mr. Randolph could not be certain as to the design, how was the committee to judge? Could they be more certain than the persons present at the occurrence? But it should be remembered where the affair happened. In a place where there was often a scramble for seats, and where the obligations of civility were not the most powerfully felt.

Another fact appears in the statement, that as Mr. Randolph left the box the cape of his coat was violently pulled. Mr. Randolph doubts whether this was done by Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds. Mr. B. said he would observe, that Mr. Randolph did not see the person who did this act. He had not stated that he saw the person. And it appeared from other evidence that the person was behind him. This act was brought home to nobody. From none of the evidence did it clearly appear by whom it was done. It was the opinion of the committee that without evidence very pointed and certain, they ought not to recommend the interposition of the House.

Mr. B. said, the serious and great ground of inquiry with the committee was, whether there had existed a premeditated design to insult. The investigation dispelled every suspicion on this subject. It manifestly appeared that whatever happened was the fruit of the occasion and of no design. But it had been alleged and strongly urged that the conduct of the officers was intended to provoke Mr. Randolph to some expression or act which would justify violence on their part. This idea was shown to be groundless, by what was stated by Mr. Randolph himself as well as by other gentlemen. In passing from the box, where the coat of Mr. Randolph was pulled, he applied to the person who pulled it the appellation of puppy, or, as stated by one gentleman, of "damned puppy." Was any notice taken of the expression? Did any one apply it to himself? Surely, if it had been done intentionally, and especially with the intention to provoke a quarrel, the person who did it had accomplished his object. What greater insult could there be, what better excuse for violence, than the ignominious appellation of damned puppy!

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Sir, said Mr. B., this is a powerful and governing circumstance in the present case. It shows how much suspicion existed, and how little fact. Circumstances trivial or unnoticed upon like occasions were upon this swelled into much importance by the designs supposed to be connected with them.

Mr. Randolph had used expressions in the course of debate which were known to have given great umbrage to the gentlemen of the same army. It might easily be suspected that young and indiscreet officers would think themselves not only allowed but bound to resent the affront. When two officers at the theatre were seen whispering to each other, and looking towards the box in which Mr. Randolph was seated, it was instantly concluded that there was an intention to insult him. He was confident that if the words which had given offence had never been made use of by Mr. Randolph that everything might have occurred which was proved to have passed, without the notice of any one. This induced the committee to a severer scrutiny of the evidence than they otherwise would have thought necessary. Whatever could be placed to the mere account of suspicion had no influence with them. They did not discredit the facts stated by any gentleman—they were implicitly admitted, but they certainly guarded against the coloring, which varied with the impressions of different persons.

Mr. B. said he would now pass to the deposition of Mr. Christie. In examining the details of it, he found much opinion, many impressions, and a great deal of belief, but on other facts than had already been noticed, and were contained in Mr. Randolph's statement. The looks and whispering of the officers had been sufficient to convince him of the intentions which they harbored. It was worth remarking that these officers had been several hours at the theatre before anything was observed. It was not till the procession of persons habited like Turks, that a word escaped them; the allusion then made to the words mercenary and ragamuffin, to which the gentleman from Virginia had given so much meaning and currency, seemed to have sprung from the occasion. If there had been any previous design to insult Mr. R. it was certainly strange that it should so long have remained dormant. It could not be supposed that the impetuous young men, stung with an insult which they felt degraded them, would have patiently waited for a moment which could have the least answered their purpose. Would it be imagined that with a direct design they would have proceeded in an equivocal manner! If it was their intention to insult, it must have been their wish to be understood. Instead, therefore, of waiting for an occasion when the fitness of their allusion would destroy its edge and give it the air of humor, they would have abruptly applied it, in such a manner and in such a way that but a single design could have been inferred.

Mr. Christie stated that he heard some one observe to the officers, "He does not hear you, go nearer to him." Who this person was, Mr. Christie did not know, nor had the committee been able to learn. They could not therefore attach much importance to words used by an unknown person. It did not appear that the person was in concert with the officers, and to have allowed them to be affected by the words of a third person, with whom they were not connected, would have been against every principle of justice.

Another circumstance of the same kind was also mentioned by the same gentleman. Upon entering the lobby a stranger told him to keep close to Mr. R., because there was a design to insult him. This stranger was also unknown, and his opinions, without his reasons, could have little weight with the committee. There was little occasion for this opinion of the stranger, it was the opinion of Mr. Christie before, and he should not have allowed the opinion of a stranger to have more weight with him than the opinion of that gentleman. The circumstance was calculated to give the idea of some dark plot, but as such a thing, upon inquiry, was proved not to have existed, the circumstance lost all its strength.

It was further stated by Mr. Christie, that, in going down stairs, they were so closely pressed by Captain McKnight and others, that it was with difficulty he could keep his feet. Mr. B. said this was a strong instance of the effect of suspicion. Mr. C. turned about and requested Captain McKnight not to crowd, and he immediately desisted. Was this consistent with an intention to insult? It evidenced much civility on the part of the Captain. He was probably pressed himself, and upon the request of Mr. C. he took the weight off his shoulders upon his own. If Captain McKnight had pressed with an intention to offend, he must have designed to make himself known, or otherwise the offence could not have been applied to him, and his end could not have been answered. But the moment any such offence could have been produced, by its being known that he was pressing, upon a civil request he so civilly desists that no offence could have been taken at his conduct.

Mr. B. said he saw nothing in Mr. Christie's deposition to carry his opinion further than it had gone on the ground of Mr. Randolph's statement.

Mr. Nicholson's deposition, Mr. B. said, was extremely correct and candid, but it contained no additional facts which went to criminate the officers. There was one circumstance in the deposition on which he should remark, which strongly supported the general reasoning of the committee. Mr. Nicholson stated that during the performance of the afterpiece, he was called out by Captain Campbell Smith, who informed him that he understood Mr. Randolph had been insulted, and inquired if he had heard anything about it; and observed that Mr. R.'s observations in Congress had been the cause. Mr. N. told him he had heard nothing of it, and asked what kind of insult had been offered. He answered he was not present, but apprehended disagreeable consequences. In fact, at this time, nothing had happened, but rumor had mounted her stalking-horse and carried the report through the theatre, of an actual insult having been offered. From this moment jealousy was awakened, and the intention to insult soon discovered. It was then that every whisper, every look, and every action, gave the impression of hostile intentions. The eye became jaundiced and every object was colored accordingly. He was inclined to believe that if no report had ever been brought to the box, of an insult having been offered to Mr. R., that no insult would have been observed. A circumstance stated by Mr. N. was supposed to carry some proof with it, of Captain McKnight having pulled the coat of Mr. Randolph in passing out of the box. Mr. N. stated that he saw the Captain throw his body forward about the time he heard Mr. Randolph say some one had pulled his coat. As to the fact, it was only a matter of inference that Captain McKnight was the person who pulled the coat of Mr. Randolph, for no one saw it. But even supposing it to have been him, the circumstance was innocently accounted for by what was stated in Captain Taylor's deposition. In going out of the box Captain McKnight had hold of Captain Taylor's arm. Some one, in order to aid himself in rising, pulled Captain Taylor so violently as to break the hold of Captain McKnight. It might well have happened that Captain McKnight in order to save himself from falling, in throwing out his hand, might unluckily have caught hold of Mr. Randolph. Mr. B. said that in his opinion in a case of this kind every explanation ought to be allowed, where there was an equal probability of its being true. To infer a criminal design from an action which was equally capable of innocent construction, was against the common principles of justice.

H. OF R.

JANUARY, 1800.

Mr. B. said the deposition of Mr. Macon was very candid. It could not be necessary for him to go through it, as it was in the hands of gentlemen, and they would observe that it contained no circumstances on which he had not already commented. He would only observe that Mr. Macon had with much propriety avoided giving his impressions as evidence; and, simply stating facts, had left the conclusion to those whose business it was to judge.

He next called the attention of the committee to the deposition of Mr. Glen, a member of this House. Though Mr. G. was in the same box with the other gentlemen, yet as he had no reason to suspect anything, he neither heard nor saw anything which bore the appearance of an insult. He should be allowed to remark, what the knowledge of every gentleman would confirm, that the color of objects depends so much upon that medium of sensibility through which we see them, that the impressions of a witness whose feelings had been strongly excited by an event which was passing, ought to be received with great caution and weighed with much precision. Upon this principle the committee had been guarded, not considering themselves as a party in the business, but in nature of a tribunal which was to do justice, they governed themselves by the same rules as in like cases were observed by the criminal courts of the country.

It had been expected that very material information could have been obtained from Captain Smith. But on his examination before the committee it was found, and so appeared by his deposition, that though he frequently saw the gentleman accused, he observed nothing exceptionable in their conduct. He repeatedly saw them in the box, and though he had heard the report which had been circulated, he could discover nothing in the demeanor of the officers which confirmed it.

Mr. B. said that if any proof was wanting on the subject it was fully established by the depositions of Captain Taylor and Lieutenant Thompson, that no scheme had been concerted to offer an insult to Mr. Randolph. The attention of the committee had been strongly directed to this point. Had anything like premeditation appeared, a very different construction would have been put upon the occurrences of the evening. In such a case the affair would have had much importance, and the committee would have been forward in calling for the vengeance of the House. But they could not be induced, by a few accidental and equivocal circumstances, to call into action the high powers of the great National Legislature.

Mr. B. said, that he was now done with the evidence, but he should beg the indulgence of the House while he replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, as to the censure which he said the report contained on the conduct of Mr. Randolph. It was said that the committee had censured Mr. R. for applying to the President for redress, and not appealing to the House on the ground of a breach of privilege. Mr. B. said that if the report was examined, it would be found that the committee had given an express opinion, that it was not the intention of Mr. R. to infringe the privileges of the House in his application to the President. In denying an improper intention, it could not be supposed to have been the view of the committee to cast much censure. No, sir, said Mr. B., our object was of much greater importance. We observed, universally, a dangerous precedent set, which vitally affected the powers and existence of this body.

He was astonished to hear the application to the Executive in such a case justified by the gentleman from Virginia. Nothing could be more fallacious than the ground he had taken. The gentleman said Mr. Randolph had a choice of remedies. The President had a power over the officers, and he might be called upon to exercise it without any infringement of the powers of this House. To illustrate his arguments, he supposed the case of an assault and battery having been committed, and asked if recourse might not have been had to the civil authority. Sir, said Mr. B., upon the case put, I have no doubt, the civil magistrate might certainly be applied to, but the great question is as to the ground on which that magistrate could punish. He could punish the breach of the peace, but could he punish the breach of privilege? An application to the civil magistrate to punish a breach of the privileges of this House would, equally with an application to the President, derogate from the rights of the House. The question therefore was, whether the application to the President in this case, was not on the ground of a breach of the privileges of the House. The consideration of this point obliged him to refer to Mr.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Randolph's letter to the President. It was dated in the Chamber of the Representatives, and is expressly addressed by Mr. Randolph, officially, to the President in his official character.

He states, that, "for words of a general nature uttered on the floor of this House, and addressed in my official capacity to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and urged with a view to effect the reduction of a Military Establishment, I have been grossly and publicly insulted by two officers" &c. Again, "so far as they (speaking of the motives of his conduct) relate to this application, addressed to you in a public capacity, they can only be supposed by you to be of a public nature; and it is enough for me to state that the independence of the Legislature has been attacked, the majesty of the people, of which you are the principal representative, insulted, and your authority contemned. In their name, I demand that a provision commensurate with the evil be made, and which will be calculated to deter others from any future attempt to introduce the reign of terror into our country."

It was impossible, Mr. B. said, to state a more explicit application for the punishment of a breach of privilege. The complaint was of an insult offered for words spoken in his place on the floor of this House. He distinguishes the very ground of complaint to be the attack on the independence of the Legislature. He disavows any personal consideration. And he demands of the President to make a provision commensurate with the evil. What was the evil stated? A direct, flagrant breach of the privileges of the House. Were not gentlemen startled at seeing the Executive applied to, to protect the privileges chiefly designed as a barrier against Executive power, and would they be disposed to throw them at the feet of the Executive. Sir, said Mr. B., if a series of precedents were permitted to establish that the Executive Magistrate was the power to be applied to when the privileges of the House were violated, there would be an end of the safety and independence of the Legislature.

Let me show, said he, the impropriety of this application by referring to the parties which exist in the country. The one is supposed to support and the other to oppose the Executive. If we depended, sir, on Executive good will, could opposition expect equal and impartial protection? Could they apply with confidence to that Executive for protection, to whom they always deny their support? But no gentleman could hesitate on the subject—the point went to the very existence of the Legislature.

Mr. BAYARD concluded with observing, that he trusted the House would be persuaded, that the committee had made the proper inferences from the testimony before them, and that they had gone no further in the expression of their opinions relative to the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia, than they were bound to do in the discharge of an incumbent and indispensable duty.

Mr. DAVIS said, since he had the honor of a seat in that House, he had ever possessed a desire and a determination to support the dignity of the House, and while he possessed this, he could not be unmindful of the privileges of a member freely to deliver his sentiments on this floor, without being amenable to any one. This being the case, he could not agree with the report of the committee; he did not consider the committee authorized to make a report upon the subject of Mr. Randolph's conduct; but even allowing, for the sake of argument, that they were, he could not see any grounds for the report they had made, in any part but one, that was, in their expression of a sense of the propriety of the conduct of the President in referring the subject to the House.

With respect to the style of Mr. Randolph's letter to the President, the committee were not at all authorized to draw those inferences from it which they had done. As was observed before, gentlemen had different modes of writing. If he was to address a letter to the President, Mr. D. said, he most likely should not write in the style that gentleman had done—indeed he believed he could not write in that style, but he knew nothing in it which could give offence: no doubt the gentleman endeavored to convey his ideas in his own language; to be sure it was not in a courtly language, nor did he know of any in the United States. As, therefore, there was no particular mode of address, no gentleman could merit censure for writing in that which was most familiar with his own judgment of propriety. Mr. D. here referred to the language used by the President in his answer to an address from Bath County, Virginia, in the following words: "It rests with Virginia to say whether there does not exist in her a faction that must be humbled in dust and ashes before the indignant frown of an injured and insulted country." Mr. D. said he left gentlemen to draw the comparison between these sentiments and Mr. Randolph's letter; he only made this reference to show that men had their own manner of writing.

He conceived the application of Mr. Randolph to the President did not merit censure, but the report of the committee had given it. The gentleman certainly was justifiable in making appeal to the President if he thought proper, although the House had also a jurisdiction over it in a certain degree. That gentleman applied to the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in that view it was certainly proper. Suppose the conduct of these gentlemen of the army had been more serious, and they had actually assaulted Mr. Randolph; by an application to this House for justice as a breach of privilege, all the House could do was to order fine and imprisonment, and the officers would retain their situation in the army; but the President had power to order a court martial to try them, and divest them of their commissions, if found guilty of the assault complained of. From this view of the subject Mr. D. believed the most regular way would have been to have applied to the House as well as to the President.

He could not subscribe to the opinion uttered by the committee, that this (what Mr. Randolph and others thought) premeditated insult towards him, was explained away. That the insult was designed, was the decided opinion of several gentlemen, as well as Mr. Randolph. But who could have satisfactorily explained it, except the gentlemen themselves had done so? What other evidence had the committee to warrant them to differ in their opinion from that of those respectable evidences which were produced? Was not the evidence of Messrs. Christie, Nicholson, and Macon, (under a solemn oath,) of more importance, and much better testimony than the mere declarations of those men who were implicated, and who could not be under oath? It was not to be expected that they would criminate themselves, and all they had to do was to deny the facts which were charged; candor was not to be expected from them. In his opinion, Mr. D. said, the weight of evidence against these men was very considerable, and merited the particular attention of the House. He also believed the report of the committee to be very improper, and also meriting attention. He supposed no gentleman would deny the right of free discussion in the House, and the inviolability of the members from personal insult on account of sentiments delivered there; and that members should not be overawed so as to intimidate them in discharging their public duty; this he believed was an indisputable principle.

In order to corroborate the opinion, that the report of the committee was very improper, it was necessary to consider the subject in two points of view. First, to inquire whether Mr. Randolph did believe he was insulted on account of what he had said in the House, and secondly, whether there was good ground for the House to believe the insult was premeditated. That Mr. Randolph believed so, appeared from his own declaration, and in this the committee coincided; they thought that he believed so. The report must appear improper, because, admitting Mr. Randolph thought it was aimed at him for his conduct in the House, it might deter him from using that liberty of free discussion in the House which the Constitution had clothed him with. Though he did not receive any material personal injury, he could not help revolving in his own mind the circumstances of the insult and the view the committee had of it, and that if he should suffer himself again to express the sensations of his heart, he would be alike insulted and alike disregarded in his complaint. These were certainly very discouraging considerations.

That there was an insult offered to Mr. Randolph, appeared to be conceded, and Mr. D. said he thought there was good ground for saying the insult was premeditated. The design, on which hung the criminality of the action, he thought the evidence fully established. It might not have entered their ideas until after they had got to the theatre, but that it was premeditated at some time previous to its execution, and that there was a combination, he conceived well proved from the impressions the conduct of these young men made on the different gentlemen who gave testimony. The gentleman from Delaware had said that suspicion outstript the facts. It might be so, but how did it happen that, besides Mr. Randolph himself, several gentlemen should fall into the same opinion that it was designed by them to insult Mr. Randolph? There certainly was a design, which gave existence to some actions from which to draw these inferences. There certainly must be reality in these suspicions, and the gentleman might as well have said that the revolution of seasons and the daily rising and setting sun was the effect of mere accident, as to say this circumstance originated in accident.

Was it by accident, Mr. D. asked, that they repeated the words "ragamuffin" and mercenary? Was it by accident one said, "go nearer to him, he don't hear you?" Was it by accident one of them forcibly pressed himself into what he knew was not a vacant seat, by the side of Mr. Randolph, and which very much incommoded him? The gentleman said it was by accident that Mr. McKnight caught hold of Mr. Randolph's coat, and that it was merely to support himself. Did this appear probable? If it had been merely an effort to recover himself, when jostled, would he not have taken hold of some person more able to support him? He certainly could not promise himself much support from Mr. Randolph.

But, said the gentleman, they had opportunity, if their design was to aggravate to a rupture, to have done it when Mr. Randolph called the person, who pulled his coat "a puppy." No; Mr. D. thought it the very reverse. He had no doubt but McKnight laid hold of that gentleman with a view of pulling him down and trampling him down by the crowd, and that Mr. Randolph's calling out as he did, deterred him from renewing his efforts to carry it into execution.

Without entering into the evidence (which he conceived must bring conviction to the mind) Mr. D. said he had adduced these few reasons for his vote in favor of a recommitment, because he was certain some unjust censures were put upon Mr. Randolph and because he did not conceive the officers clothed with that innocence which the report stated. There was one part, as he observed before, and one only, of the report which he approved, and that was the respectful sense entertained by the House of the conduct of the President in submitting it to the consideration of the House, as a breach of privilege. To this resolution he should heartily agree.

Mr. JONES said he rose, as one of the committee who made the report, to show his reasons for differing from a majority of that committee, and why he should vote for recommitting the report. It had been stated, and he believed consistently with the rules of the House, that the reasoning upon which was founded any resolutions reported by a committee was not a subject of deliberation in the House, and therefore was not capable of amendment or alteration there. It was because he thought the deductions were not warranted by the facts, in the present instance, that the report did not meet his approbation; he wished the report to be recommitting, in order that the exceptionable parts of the preamble might undergo some modification; and not to go abroad as an act of the House in its present shape and tenor.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Mr. J. said he should now state the particular paragraphs of the report to which he objected. The first related to the style of Mr. Randolph's letter to the President. He did not consider this subject as referred to the committee at all. Indeed it was admitted in the committee that it was not directly referred to them, but it was contended that it was referred indirectly. He differed from that opinion, and thought he was warranted by the letter of the President. The notice the President took of the style of Mr. Randolph's letter, he supposed intended only to intimate his sense of it, without desiring any proceedings thereon. The President writes thus, "I have thought proper to submit the whole letter and its tendencies to your consideration;" that is, the import and drift of the letter; and takes occasion to subjoin, "without any other comments on its matter or style." From which it appeared plain that the letter and its tendencies were the only objects submitted and which he wished to be acted upon. The mention of its style was only intended as a retort. Mr. J. did not believe the President wished the House to interpose in support of that respectful demeanor to him which his station demanded, and which he knew how to preserve.

The letter alluded to was objected to and censured as disrespectful, and although, Mr. J. said, he had called upon the members of the committee who were in favor of the report to point out the objectionable expressions, or to show the proper mode of redress, yet they had not done it, nor had the gentleman from Delaware on Friday, in his long and able defence of the committee, thought proper to do it. He thought it but reasonable and proper that if any gentleman had, and expressed objections, he should point out the grounds of them, otherwise it would naturally be thought that they are not tenable. If it was in the style only, Mr. J. said, he knew of no other particular style in which the President ought to be addressed, and therefore no particular style, if decent, could be justly complained of. Considering it as not a part of the duty of the committee, he considered it an unnecessary and improper extension of their powers to take it up.

The next paragraph Mr. J. objected to was the fourth, where the committee had censured Mr. R. for his application to the President, and had declared the subject exclusively cognizable in this House, and that Mr. Randolph's conduct was derogatory from the rights of the House.

He did not consider a gentleman as forfeiting his citizenship when he took a seat in that House, nor less entitled to the protection of the law. He therefore thought, that though Mr. Randolph might have appealed to the House, he could appeal to the President without acting derogatory to the rules or privileges of the Legislature. He certainly was justifiable, knowing the disagreeable consequences the agitation of such a question in the House must produce. Suppose an assault had been committed, it would have then been cognizable in a court of law; if the gentleman had taken that mode of redress, instead of agitating the House, would he not have been commendable, and would that alternative have been derogatory to the rights of the House?

It was allowed that the application to the President might have been proper if he had not come forward upon the score of privilege, to obtain redress for an insult as a member of Congress. Suppose he had applied, in case of assault, to a court of law. It would have been incumbent on him to state the causes for the assault; that the resentment arose from the use of words in debate, which disobliterated the persons charged. Surely that would not exclude him from proper redress! To bring the point nearer to view, let us imagine another case—I mean no disparagement in the comparison. Suppose a common soldier had insulted a member of Congress for any part of his public conduct, would he not conceive that his commanding officer if a man of sense and discretion would give that redress which would be satisfactory? He would therefore, apply to the captain, who was vested with authority sufficient for that purpose by the rules and articles of war. No gentleman would say but it would be a preferable mode to taking it up upon the serious ground of a question of privilege, although he possessed the power and in his discretion might make that appeal. So in the present circumstance, the President, as Commander-in-Chief had power over the military, he gave the officers their commissions, and might take them away if he was convinced of the propriety of it. The gentleman was certainly right, therefore, in taking that course in preference to the other disagreeable alternative. Nay, the President himself knew that he possessed a cognizance of the affair, and therefore he had informed the House that he had directed inquiry to be made into it by the proper officers, and there was no doubt but he would give the proper redress.

The next part of the report, Mr. J. took notice of, was the opinion expressed by the committee on the facts and testimony which had come before them, which they had said were either satisfactorily explained or too equivocal to merit attention. If the members of Congress were entitled to any kind of protection in their public conduct and expressions on the floor of the House, he should be glad to know how it was that words or actions, which tended to produce quarrels and provoke retort on account of that public conduct, could be so explained as not to be a breach of privilege. Where is the efficacy or the value of privilege if a member should be compelled to be the butt and ridicule of the company, if he appears at any place of public entertainment? Agreeably to the opinion of the committee, gentlemen must bear the taunts and railery of every one who may find occasion to be displeased at any part of their conduct in the House, so that it did not amount to actual assault! But that was not the common mode of interpreting actions. Among gentlemen, the intention was the criterion by which to judge of an insult. No matter how vague or indirect, no matter how equivocal the circumstances were, if the intention was to insult, the conduct would be noticed and resented. So in the present case, as it was in his opinion clear, Mr. J. said, that the intention was to insult Mr. Randolph for his public conduct, the House were as much bound to notice it as though the offence was the most palpable.

Surely no man could mistake the intention of these officers; it was clearly to wound the feelings of Mr. Randolph. Nay, this was admitted by gentlemen, but to exculpate them it was said that no premeditated intention was discovered. If it was proved, that no intention was formed previous to their going into the theatre, he was willing so to believe; but if it was proved to have been their design but one moment previous to using the words, it possessed the properties of premeditation, and the gentleman was entitled to redress upon the score of privilege. The gentleman from Delaware admitted that if the circumstances were as stated, and the design could be proved, it would be entitled to redress on the score of privilege. Mr. J. conceived the facts were clearly made out. Where could there be facts more clearly demonstrated and charges more fully substantiated than those contained in the letter of Mr. Randolph to the chairman of the committee? That gentleman's opinion was, that they made use of certain words repeatedly, with the design of producing a quarrel; the gentleman charged acknowledged that they did frequently make use of the words. Who that was acquainted with the previous proceeding in the House could doubt but it was meant to apply to Mr. Randolph? Where would have been the merit or what the end of making use of them if Mr. Randolph had not been there? Indeed their use of the words "Virginia ragamuffins," must clearly ascertain their application to a gentleman from that State, and the repetition of the words so frequently, so near him, could leave no room to doubt but they were meant to apply to Mr. Randolph.

The act of taking Mr. Randolph by the coat after he went out of the box, Mr. J. said, appeared to him to have been done by Captain McKnight. Indeed that gentleman only denied sitting down by Mr. Randolph; and his not denying the other act charged in Mr. R.'s statement, was a confession of it. Captain Taylor had given testimony that he believed Captain McKnight laid hold of somebody's shoulder, as he went out of the box. Notwithstanding the gentleman from Delaware said that Captain McKnight was in advance of Mr. Randolph, yet it appeared from the evidence of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Thompson that he passed that gentleman just at the moment Mr. Randolph exclaimed "Who was it that jerked my coat?" and from their evidence it was very probable that he was the person. However, to put this matter beyond a doubt, it was confessed by Captain McKnight himself—he said before, the committee that he was the man who laid his hand on Mr. R.'s shoulder, but he did it gently, and with moderation.

Mr. HARPER asked if this was admitted as testimony, and if not whether it was properly mentioned to the House?

Mr. JONES said he was only identifying the fact that this was the man who took hold of Mr.

Randolph. It was not admitted as testimony to the committee, because it was said by some of the members of the committee that it would be wrong to ask a man to give testimony against himself. Mr. J. said he thought so, but it was voluntarily given, and as such in his opinion ought to have been produced to the House.

Mr. HARPER again appealed to the point of order.

Mr. JONES said he had explained what the gentleman said with truth and candor, and not to injure the gentleman; he was going on to relate that Captain McKnight said he did not do it to insult Mr. R., he wished to give him full justice in this case, but he should always make known everything that would display truth, however displeasing to any gentleman.

Mr. NICHOLAS appealed to the Chair, whether it was proper for the House to suppress facts merely because a majority of a committee should not choose to produce them. He thought it was proper to obtain every information necessary, although the committee had not produced it.

The SPEAKER said that the report of the committee contained the evidence which came before them; if that was fairly taken, it was laid before the House as evidence to guide the House. It was fairly taken unless there could be a charge substantiated before the House that the committee had omitted material evidence. Unless, therefore, the charge should be made good, it was the opinion of the Chair that it was not proper for admission.

Mr. JONES confessed that he did not urge the necessity of taking this evidence, because he considered the same fact fully substantiated without it, and should not now have noticed this fact if the gentleman from Delaware had not said it was doubtful who was the man that took hold of Mr. Randolph. The gentleman from Delaware admitted that the persons charged used the words referred to, and that repeatedly, and with intention to wound the feelings of Mr. R.; yet he would not admit that the House ought to act on it.

Mr. J. begged gentlemen to reflect on the consequences if this doctrine should prevail. If words were allowed to be used to produce irritation on account of the public conduct of any gentleman, and with intent to wound his feelings, if no protection was to be had in the House against such treatment, the right of privilege, under which it was pretended members were protected, would be insignificant. If members must bear the mockery of disappointed or disaffected men for what they said in that House, the boasted freedom of debate must be considered as a nullity. Personal abuse was much less to be dreaded, in his opinion, than to be exposed in every company to aggravations of that sort.

In order to soften down this conduct, the gentleman had pointed out the manner in which the public prints treated gentlemen for their expressions used in the House. Surely this was a very inapt comparison. These anonymous publications were not entitled to notice, and gentlemen were justified in disregarding them. But many things said in a newspaper were totally disregarded, which, if said to a gentleman's face, would not be passed over. These publications were not calculated to produce irritation and violence, or to provoke men to quarrels, but were sent abroad to create amusement, and no harm was produced by them; and when they had evil tendencies, were punishable by law. But the manner of using these words, when connected with the subsequent conduct, must produce a very different effect.

Mr. J. then proceeded to take a view of that part of the report of the committee which stated some facts to be too equivocal to justify the interference of that House on the ground of a breach of privilege, and others as satisfactorily explained.

He did agree with the committee that this was not so flagrant a case as to require the House going into the solemn question of privilege. He wished the whole question to be avoided. But when he said that, he did not mean to say that the whole amount of these facts did not constitute what was so termed; because this would appear too much like pointing out the line to which a person might go towards insulting a member of the House, and where to stop, with safety. He did not suppose there was any attack premeditated, in the present case, nor any design to step on the privileges of the House; but finding a member of Congress at the theatre, who had used words not very pleasing to their profession, they had indulged themselves in imprudent conduct. From these considerations he had been and still was willing to pass it over as lightly as possible. But, while he would thus lightly look over this improper conduct in the officers, he would never agree to reprehend and pass a censure on the gentleman who had been ill treated; for this, instead of saying to gentlemen, "You shall be protected in all your conduct on this floor," would be to say, "If you charge any man with insulting you, you will meet our severe censure." This language being held out, would deter gentlemen from appealing to the House, and tend to make the members of Congress amenable to every listener, and subject to their scoffs in every company, or compel them to have recourse to another mode of redress.

The gentleman from Delaware had supposed that if the intention of these officers had been to produce a quarrel, they had a fair opening when Mr. Randolph used the word puppy to the person who pulled his coat. This argument must fall, Mr. J. said, when it was considered that it appeared from the affidavits of Captain Taylor and others that Captain McKnight did not hear these words used, and therefore they could not have produced that effect.

There could be no doubt but these gentlemen's feelings were wounded in the expressions applied to the Army by Mr. Randolph, in the House, and there can be as little doubt but they intended to wound his feelings in return, by their repetition of them; and, from the aggregate of their conduct, probably they wished to create a quarrel. They must have known their conduct was irritating. That impression was made on a number of gentlemen present. It had spread further; a rumor had gone abroad in the theatre that an insult was given to that gentleman, and apprehensions were formed that evil consequences would ensue. It was therefore not to be wondered that some of Mr. Randolph's friends should have taken that impression.

Mr. J. hoped it was the intention of the House to protect every member in the exercise of his rights, in the freedom of debate, and to afford ample redress in cases of insult. But, as he observed before, he wished not, in the present case, to carry into execution the full powers which the House possessed; he wished rather an expression of disapprobation of the conduct of the officers, as of a matter not of that magnitude to demand punishment. But why the member who made the appeal should meet a censure worse than the offenders he could not conceive; and therefore hoped the report would be recommitted, and undergo an alteration, before it filled a place in the proceedings of the House.

When Mr. J. had concluded, an adjournment being called for,

The House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, January 27.

THOMAS PINCKNEY, from South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the order for a call of the House this day, be dispensed with, and that there be a call of the House to-morrow, at two o'clock.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the third reading of the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, be suspended until to-morrow.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States, together with a letter from John Randolph, Jr., a member of this House from the State of Virginia.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that having obeyed the command of the House in the testimony he had given, he hoped to have been permitted to give a silent vote on every question which might come before the House on the present subject; but the conduct of the gentleman from Delaware, on Friday, had obliged him to deviate from that determination in rising upon what must be very disagreeable, a justification of his own deposition. He could not have apprehended the gentleman would have made so wanton an attack on the deposition of any man whom he had no reason to believe would deviate from fact. The gentleman was pleased to say that he (Mr. C.) was so fortunate as to see more and hear more than any one else who was in the same situation. Mr. C. said he considered himself rather unfortunate in knowing and seeing so much. But although his deposition contained so much of the transactions of that evening, yet the gentleman from Delaware appeared to be much the best pleased with the depositions of gentlemen who saw the least of it!

In the gentleman's examination of the evidence, he appeared more like the county-court lawyer, whose business was to make the worst appear in the best light, and to reduce the most important testimony to nothing, than as an honorable member of the National Legislature, where the strictest impartiality should mark his conduct, and where no impressions should be formed but from a just view of evidence.

Farther, he has charged me, indirectly, said Mr. C., with a want of candor in my deposition. He has said of the other gentlemen, that there was much candor in their testimony. What is there in my testimony to deprive me of the same approbation? I did not wish him to commend my testimony, because his approbation would not make it the more truth; but I think he might have placed mine in the same situation he placed others. The encouragement he has taken to draw these insinuations is, my having introduced my suspicions with my evidence. This appeared to me a case of absolute necessity. There were many little circumstances that could not well be introduced into an affidavit. I endeavored to give my opinion from my real impressions; I am sure I have done it with candor, whatever that gentleman may insinuate. I have not misstated a single circumstance that came under my observation. I had my suspicions awakened, and therefore I did not go away as I had intended. Why were these impressions made? I will relate one particular ground. In the course of the morning, in a company of some officers and other gentlemen, the conversation turned up about the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Randolph;) some of the officers said he ought to have his neck broke; that the officers ought to be picked out, one by one, till they had killed him. Having heard this, and perceiving and hearing what I did at the theatre in the evening, my suspicions were naturally awakened; I thought it my duty to prevent mischief if possible. I did not attend at all to the play, but paid particular attention to every word and every action which transpired between these officers. This was one reason why I was so fortunate as to know more than others.

Farther, the gentleman says that I have stated no facts. What he thinks are facts I cannot say, but I will submit to the consideration of the House what I call facts. I saw the officers there. That is one fact. I saw them look toward our box. That is another fact. Another is, I heard one of them say, after using the words ragamuffin and mercenary, "he does not hear you, go nearer to him." I heard this perfectly plain, and this the more awakened my observation, because I could not mistake Mr. Randolph to be the object of their ridicule. But the gentleman supposes I was mistaken in another fact; that of Capt. McKnight's sitting beside Mr. Randolph. What evidence has he that I am mistaken? None but the bare assertion of that gentleman himself. I am sure of the circumstance. I saw him sit down; he touched my elbow in sitting down, and made a slight apology with his head for so doing. I rather think the gentleman wants candor himself, or he would never scrutinize my testimony with so suspicious an eye, when he has no ground for so doing.

I was not the only person who was so fortunate as to receive impressions that an insult was intended; other gentlemen who had less occasion, thought the same. I marked every transaction—I well remember their words; it is impossible that I should be mistaken in either. That gentleman might have his reasons for so speaking of my testimony, for aught I know, but certainly he treated it as neither candid nor honest. I could not be insensible of his harsh treatment of my testimony, particularly when he spoke of the candor of every other gentleman.

I do not think the committee obtained all the information they could have procured. I did expect that they would have asked Captain Smith who the gentleman was that gave him the information of his apprehensions about the conduct of these officers. I must confess, had I been on the committee, I should have put the question. The gentleman was in town, he had been in the box; there can be no doubt but he could have given some important evidence, but this they neglected to obtain.

As I believe the report of the committee conveys an unjust censure on Mr. Randolph, and as I think it can be reported in a manner much more acceptable to a majority of this House if recommended, I shall therefore vote in favor of the motion.

Mr. SEWALL, having been a member of the committee, and having fully concurred in the report, considered it his duty to show the inquiries and reasons which led him to a concurrence with the committee, and would induce him to vote against the motion now before the House. It appeared to him necessary to express some cautions to gentlemen on this occasion.

The House were now sitting as judges upon the conduct of their fellow-citizens who were not members of the House; they were now judging in a case in which the feelings of gentlemen must necessarily make them a party; they were called upon to defend the privileges of the House, in which they were judges from the necessity of the case, with a power to determine the nature of the offence, the punishment of it, and the degree of punishment to be inflicted. In this situation it became proper for gentlemen to divest themselves of resentment, which the supposed injury to themselves would excite, as much as possible; of their sympathy with the accuser, who has been more immediately affected; and rather to take the place of the persons accused; to consider what were the natural and allowable feelings to which officers of the army must be excited on hearing of the expressions which had been made use of by the gentleman from Virginia on the floor of the House, unnecessarily, and without any occasion from the debate in which they were uttered. The words, if not peculiarly applied to them, respected their profession and the reputation of the service in which they had engaged; and if they thought proper to pass about, in the way of jest, the words by which they had been hurt, surely it could not be necessary for the House to pursue this as a breach of privilege. Whether the words were repeated in the street or at the playhouse, if, scattered in the air, they should reach the ears of the persons who gave them birth, ought he to feel himself injured! It was merely a repetition of the words used by the gentleman, and these could not be offensive to him, unless from his consciousness that they had been by himself improperly used and applied.

A further caution, Mr. S. said, he found it necessary to express, from what he heard that morning. The House sat as judge on this case. It was an established principle, in the administration of justice, that the judge shall be influenced only by the evidence before him, and that he ought not to admit his own conjectures, or to believe beyond the evidence. He had this morning observed a member of the House, in whose candor he had usually confided, imprudently carried away by his feelings. Had not a gentleman said that he firmly believed it was not merely the design of the persons accused in this case to pull the coat off the gentleman from Virginia, but to trample him down? Was this the dictate of those impartial, those cautious sensations which ought to possess the breast of a judge? When members of the House were carried away by those improper conjectures and predispositions, a caution to them he conceived might be allowed as very necessary.

Farther. It was the duty of a judge when undertaking to be a witness to distinguish his situation. Yet there were several gentlemen who acted in the double capacity of witness and judge. One of those gentlemen had undertaken to argue upon his own testimony, and adduce his opinion thereupon, mixing additional evidence. Surely these circumstances must prove the necessity of extreme caution in those who would be impartial in their inquiries and just in their decisions in this case.

Mr. S. then proceeded to show the reasons which led him to concur in the report of the committee.

First. A previous inquiry ought to be, what are the privileges of the House which they undertook to vindicate? To what extent are they to be carried? In the present instance the privileges in question might be inferred from one, and that a very important right of this House, that every member should be free in debate; that he ought not to be called in question by any person, or in any other place, for what he had done or declared in the capacity of a Representative and in the proceedings of the House. But when the question is whether any member has been injured in this important right, gentlemen must also consider to what extent their privileges in this respect have been claimed. What had been the established practice of the House, Mr. S. asked, till the present time? Have not the expressions of members uttered in debate, with the addition of the most insulting calumnies and injurious commentaries, issued forth from the press and been disseminated throughout the United States? Has there been any precedent, any instance of a printer or publisher, who has been called to the bar of any House of Congress for this offence as for a breach of privilege? It has never been thought worthy of notice, much less of punishment. He was now speaking before an assembly a majority of whom had, a few days ago, declared they would not preserve in their code of laws the statute by which those are to be punished who shall falsely and maliciously traduce the President or either House of Congress, by misrepresenting, not in words but in writing, their official proceedings; will this House then punish any man for merely a repetition of words, however reproachful, that had been previously uttered by a member of the House? If it was the settled law, determined by the practice of every House of Representatives since the Constitution, that the observations which members have used in debate may be repeated, published, and uttered, without exposing to punishment, there could be thus far no crime in this case.

Mr. S. said, he would consider the case in two points of view. First, as it respected the words as separated from any action; and secondly as it respected the words connected with what had been called the personal insult offered. In either view he thought he should justify the report. With respect to the first, he had already observed it would be a departure from the constant practice of the House to punish for merely the publication or repetition of words; such publications had been accompanied oftentimes with the most insulting strictures. He was certain the House would not begin at this time to punish where the publication had not been accompanied with any commentaries or insult. The use or repetition of the words alluded to in the charge might not have been intended as an offence, and was natural in officers upon whose minds the degrading epithets which had been bestowed on their employments must rest. It may be observed also that those epithets had been very improperly applied to the army, in the House. Indeed the repetition of them was a much more proper application as made at the playhouse, more according to the facts; but the application of such epithets to the Army of the United States, was not according to the truth, but must be attributed to the warmth of the member who had used them in debate.

But gentlemen have said that the repetition of the words of Mr. Randolph was with the purpose of producing a quarrel, and, considered with that design, the offence must amount to a breach of privilege. Whether this was or was not the case, Mr. S. said, the House as well as the committee may be at some loss to discover. It was probable if the intention had been to produce a quarrel the offensive words would have been more pointedly used, so as not to admit of a doubt as to that intention. If the gentleman himself thought so, his most proper way would have been to have asked an explanation. Judging from all the circumstances of the evidence as it now appears, and especially from the positive declarations of the officers charged, it may be reasonably concluded that an inquiry would have produced an apology perfectly satisfactory at the time, and the affair would have proceeded no further; and if that had happened there would have been more evidence before the House as to the intention. But that was not done. It was not pretended that these words were addressed to Mr. Randolph, if there was an intention that they should apply to him. It appeared that the occasion arose from a scene that was then exhibited on the stage; this might have reminded them of the words which had been used respecting the army, and which they must have considered as degrading their profession in the Hall of Congress.

H. OF R.

Breach of Privilege.

JANUARY, 1800.

But, Mr. S. said, he would beg leave to refer the House to the part of the evidence which was considered as proving a personal insult. One circumstance was, that Mr. Reynolds sat down in a place which was scarce sufficient to contain him, and, in sitting down, pressed Mr. Randolph. Whether this was meant to offend, or not, did not appear; but it would have been very easy for Mr. Randolph to have learnt the intention by asking it, and it was rather a wonder that that gentleman, supposing it to be meant so, had not then discovered it. But it appeared that there was an excuse for this action, arising from the evidence. In Mr. Randolph's statement, to which, as to facts, Mr. S. said he would give implicit credit, it appeared that Mr. Reynolds sat down in a place which Mr. Christie had just left; he perhaps thought he had a right to sit in it, and he did not think proper or find it in his power to take an exact measure whether it was large enough, since it had been occupied by another person; it having been left, made an apology not necessary, since Mr. Randolph could occupy the same room as before. This he did not offer as a lawyer's apology, but as a reasonable inference, and in this habit it was considered in the committee. This excuse would also appear reasonable from another part of the testimony. Just before Mr. Reynolds took this place, all the persons in the box had been attracted by a scene that was exhibiting, and got upon their feet. The time of returning to take their seats was the moment when Mr. Reynolds sat down.

Mr. S. thought Mr. Christie must have been mistaken as to Mr. McKnight's taking that seat. Mr. Randolph himself did not say he was beside him, nor was it said by any other witness, but Captain McKnight denied it. However, that was immaterial.

Another circumstance stated was, Mr. Randolph's coat being pulled. That he had his coat pulled, and that he thought it was intended as an insult, there was no doubt; but Mr. S. thought it was entirely impossible to collect from the testimony who it was done by; or, if that were known, it would be difficult to discover that it was intended to insult that gentleman. Whether it was done with such a degree of violence as to make it worthy of notice did not appear. The House could not attend to insinuations in this particular; they must let facts dictate their decision. He wished gentlemen to consider the situation the theatre was in; every one hurrying to get out before others. No doubt the press was very great, and it would be no wonder if a gentleman should suffer a degree of violence in such a situation—it was almost inevitable. As to the acknowledgment made by Captain McKnight before the committee, it was not taken as evidence; but if the pulling of Mr. Randolph's coat is to be considered as proved upon Captain McKnight by his confession—and there seems to be no other proof of it—the whole of that confession must be taken together, and from that it must result that his taking hold of Mr. Randolph at the moment of leaving the box was at least intended to be gentle, was accidental, and without any purpose of insult to the gentleman.

Mr. S. declared that if there could have appeared from any part of the whole testimony a design to ill use Mr. Randolph, the committee certainly would have recommended a censure upon the parties who should have been found guilty, and he should have willingly joined in such a report; but, to the apprehension of a majority of the committee, there was no proof of ill usage, nor was there any ill intention deducible from the words or conduct which had been proved.

But were these persons declared innocent in the report? By no means. The committee had only declared their opinion to be that sufficient cause did not appear to induce a notice of this transaction on the ground of a breach of privilege. They by no means cleared the parties charged of every misconduct. There may remain suspicions of guilt when there is not sufficient evidence for conviction; the committee had framed their opinion from the testimony, that testimony was before the House, it was therefore for the House to decide. If censure and if punishment was at all necessary, it could be ordered.

The motion now before the House was for a recommitment of the report, upon the idea that the committee had gone beyond their authority, or that they had improperly used their authority, by expressing an opinion upon the style and mode of application to the President of the United States, which eventually brought this business before the House. If the arguments had been confined to this point, Mr. S. said, he should have been glad; but as it appeared by the conduct of gentlemen who first took up the question that the whole of the report was in discussion, he had been obliged to pursue them upon the merits of the resolutions.

He should now say a few words as to the supposed impropriety of the committee expressing their opinion. In what had they been guilty of impropriety? Had they exceeded the authority given to them? They were not specially a committee appointed to take the letter of the President and that of Mr. Randolph into consideration. The committee thought themselves under a necessity of considering it in a point of view in which they had reported. The regret expressed by the committee, Mr. S. said, was a regret which he felt the moment he had heard the letter read. He believed if gentlemen would examine the style of that letter they would regret that it was ever sent to the President. It certainly did not show a disposition to support that dignity which ought to be preserved inviolate between the different departments of the Government. There was a kind of comparison of equality in the mode of address always indecorous in itself, and which ought not to be used from an inferior to a superior officer of the Government. He thought he did not speak improperly in saying that they, as members of the House, were inferior in their official capacity to the President of the United States. To preserve these distinctions, and the dignity of an official character, was particularly necessary for the preservation of the Government. Those who were exalted by their fellow-citizens should be treated with that respect, and being raised higher in power by the people, the more peculiar the respect to be paid to the office and authority, which is created for the common good. There was a very improper style of comparison, an evident indecorum through the whole tenor of the letter addressed by Mr. Randolph, and that, he thought, a mere perusal of the letter would as well prove as any comment could. But they had not expressed a censure on the member, and therefore the argument in that view must fail. They only expressed a regret that such a thing should be. A censure upon the author was not necessarily implied.

Another paragraph having been pointed out as exceptionable, wherein the committee considered the application to the President, however otherwise intended, as derogating from the rights of the House, Mr. S. wished to say a few words to. How was this application to be considered? Certainly as an appeal to the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, complaining of the conduct of some of the officers of the army. Some of the gentlemen have said, there could be no doubt but the President possessed authority to regulate the subordinate officers; but how had the gentleman in this instance made his appeal? That his independence and rights as a member of the House had been infringed. Now that this was an appeal to the President for redress was clearly established by the perusal of the letter, and that such an appeal by a member of Congress was improper was equally well established. The committee could not be ignorant of these truths, and, knowing them, they were justifiable in saying that the appeal was made to an improper authority, because the appeal bore on its face a charge which respected a breach of the privileges of the House, a charge which is there exclusively cognizable, and to this jurisdiction the President had paid a suitable regard in his reference of the inquiry to them.

If this application had been made by a gentleman of a party who are supposed to favor the increase of Executive authority, Mr. S. supposed the attempt would have been treated as an aggravated offence, and they should not have heard the last of it for some time.

Mr. S. said he had thus briefly given some of the reasons which weighed with the committee in determining their report, and these reasons would still induce him to vote for the resolutions. He hoped the report would not be recommitted; he could see no ground for so doing; the report, so far as it has been objected to by the gentleman who moved the recommitment, only contained the reasoning of the committee, and was not an act of the House. With respect to the resolutions, they could be amended or rejected when they came before the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he did not intend to have offered any observations upon this subject, but he felt himself called upon by the remarks of the member from Massachusetts, (Mr. SEWALL,) who had just sat down. That gentleman had expressed an opinion, a part of which was a novelty to him, and which he certainly did not expect to have heard from a lawyer. He had said "that 'our present situation was a very important one, and the authority derived from it ought to be 'exercised with great caution; and that when a 'man became a witness in a case, he ought not to 'consent to sit in judgment upon it.'" Mr. N. said he trusted that he felt the high importance of his station as fully as any member upon that floor; but although he had been summoned by the committee to give testimony in this affair, yet this was not to deprive him of the Constitutional authority which he possessed of deciding upon every question which came before the House, either in its legislative or judicial capacity. It was a right which his constituents expected him to exercise, and he was resolved not to surrender it while they continued to repose their confidence in him. When he had made his affidavit, in obedience to the commands of the committee, he did not think himself at liberty to state his impressions, but as he was now on the floor, he would offer his opinions upon the testimony and the report which was under consideration.

He was somewhat surprised to hear the honorable member from Massachusetts (Mr. SEWALL) attempt a vindication of the officers on the score of an allowance for their feelings, which, Mr. N. said, he was willing to admit might have been somewhat wounded by the expressions of his friend from Virginia; but if they were to be justified in offering insult to the representative body because their feelings were to plead their excuse, he did not know how or where such conduct was to be checked. If members of this House are to be exposed to outrage and insult, and are then to be told that the feelings of military men had been excited, and therefore they were to be excused, what, he asked, was the necessity for the Constitutional guard of freedom of debate? But, said he, this mode of defence grants precisely what we insist on. While gentlemen attempt to extenuate, they tacitly admit the commission of the offence charged, and convict those whom they endeavor to acquit. Mr. Randolph's language, say they, was aggravated and improper, and therefore it must be supposed would naturally provoke the subsequent conduct. Granted—and this is the point contended for, for it admits the very fact in dispute: that this conduct did actually ensue.

Mr. N. said, he had thought the report of the committee extremely incorrect in a variety of points, and the very ingenious explanation of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) had not induced him to change his opinion. It appeared to him that the committee had conducted the business entirely as if it had been a petty case between two individuals, and only interesting to the House because they were to decide on it; for, instead of examining Mr. Randolph upon oath, as they did every other witness, they barely procured a statement from him, in the same manner as from Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds, thus holding out an appearance to the world that Mr. Randolph was equally concerned with the officers. To be sure, one of the committee had explained this, but still it did not remove the objection, for however excusable the committee might be, yet this did not change the face of the report; it still went to the public as a naked question between individuals, and thus they would be induced to overlook it, as of no consequence to them, and will not give it that investigation which their invaded rights demand. But, sir, said Mr. N., I view it in a different light. I consider it as a question between this House and the officers of the Army and Navy. I consider it as a question between the civil and military authorities of the country. I consider it as a question between the sovereignty and independence of the people, and the influence of Executive authority. But, sir, the committee will appear to have thought otherwise, by inducing a belief that Mr. Randolph was a party interested, and therefore not to be used as a witness, when in fact he was only concerned as every other member in this House is—all being equally interested to preserve the freedom of debate.

But what in his mind was a powerful objection to the report, he said, was that the committee had exceeded the authority delegated to them by the House, in undertaking to censure the style of Mr. Randolph's letter to the President. The member from Delaware had indeed attempted to explain this part of the report also, by declaring that the committee did not mean to convey censure; but it appeared to him that the language was extremely strong, though they had affected to be somewhat modest about it. They express their disapprobation in pointed terms, and I have always thought that an expression of disapprobation amounted to censure, and an expression of approbation amounted to applause. But I deny the power or authority of the committee to make any strictures on the style of this letter. From whence do they derive so much authority? No such power was delegated by the House, for the Constitution gives them none. I know of no law providing for the case; the general rules and practice of the House afford no precedent that I have heard stated; by what right then, I again ask, did the committee undertake the task of criticism? Who erected them into a committee of censorship for the preservation of form and decorum? If we are to agree with the member from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) this authority was derived from the President, for that gentleman tells us that the language was offensive to the President, and that out of respect to him they were bound to notice it. Is this, sir, a ground which the National Legislature ought to take? Are we to enter into all the President's feelings? Are we to participate in his resentments? Shall this House descend from the dignity of guarding the rights of a great people, to the paltry office of settling rules and forms of etiquette? No, sir, it is as inconsistent with the character of a Republican Government as it is exceeding the authority under which we act. In courts, sir, I have been told that these forms are deemed essential, and that therefore much care is taken to preserve them. They publish the necessary style of address, and you can easily find out whether you are to call your fellow-man his Majesty, his Grace, his Lordship, or his Honor. But plainness and simplicity are the characteristics of a Republican Government, and ought not to be laid aside; for, in proportion to the establishment of titles and distinctions, in the same proportion do we lose sight of that equality which the member from Massachusetts (Mr. SEWALL) appears to think the offensive part of Mr. Randolph's letter.

I was surprised to hear that gentleman talk of grades in dignity on this side of the Atlantic, and object to this letter because Mr. R. discovered an opinion that he was on a level with the President. What, sir, is the President more than man? Because it is the custom in other countries to clothe a human being with the robes of state, and then fall down and worship him, shall we declare that our Chief Magistrate is exalted above the level of his race, and that those are his inferiors who are servants to the same sovereign people! True, he has more power, and is elected by more people than a member of this House, but then he has more masters, and is still a servant; we are all made by the voice of the people, and that voice can destroy us. It is the pride and boast of our Government that every man in it is subject to the same laws, and enjoys the same rights; that although we, with the President, are elected for a time to make laws for the good of the whole, yet after having performed our routine of service, we lay down our employments and return again to private life, become responsible to our fellow-citizens, and depend on our good conduct here for their approbation. Surely this gives a member of this House a right to consider himself on a level with the President, because in these respects an equality exists between them, inasmuch as they are both servants to the people, and this is the light in which my friend from Virginia considered it. The member from Massachusetts (Mr. SEWALL) might as well be displeased because his letters were addressed to plain Mr. Such-a-one, instead of the honorable Mr. Such-a-one; an unmeaning title which we have assumed without authority. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I should have addressed the President in the same style, because, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) said, I do not know that I could; but if I had been consulted about this letter (which I believe none of Mr. Randolph's friends were) I do not think there is a single word which I could have advised him to blot. It is written in a style of manly independence, consistent with the character of a freeman who disdains to address himself to power in the language of adulation.

Let me again repeat, sir, that the committee have exceeded their authority. There was but one fact which they had to inquire into, and that was whether the officers had or had not been guilty of a breach of privilege, and this is the only fact on which they should have reported.

But, sir, in the third paragraph, the committee have again fallen into the error of giving this business the appearance of an affair between individuals. They have told you that Mr. Randolph demands "redress." I deny it. He asked no redress, but he requires a remedy to prevent future evils of a similar nature. What is redress? It is a compensation for an injury sustained. Does he ask compensation? No, sir. When a man has been injured in his person, he appeals to the laws of his country, by instituting a civil suit, and recovers damages to compensate him for the injury, and this is redress; but the offender is also punished for a breach of the peace, and this is the remedy (not the redress) applied by the State to deter others from the perpetration of similar offences against society. This, sir, is what Mr. Randolph demanded; the rights and independence of the Legislature had been attacked, the majesty of the people had been insulted, he therefore required the application of a remedy which might show to other military men the necessity of conducting themselves with decency and respect towards the civil authorities.

The fourth paragraph of the report appears to me highly exceptionable. It not only declares Mr. Randolph's application to the President to be improper, but that he himself had violated the privileges of the House. For, whatever is in derogation of the rights of this House must be considered as a violation of its privileges. This is a charge of a serious nature levelled at one of the Representatives of the people, and if true, ought to be punished. But, in my opinion, this application to the President was not only proper, but highly commendable. It discovered a spirit of mildness and forbearance which will rather command the esteem and approbation than the censure of the public. He had the choice of two remedies, either an application to this House, or to the President, and he preferred that which at the same time would be equally effectual, and yet be less harsh and severe.

But let me illustrate this conduct on the part of Mr. Randolph, by comparing it with a case of more familiarity. If a member of this House had been arrested for debt by a sheriff's officer while attending in the discharge of his official duty, the officer no doubt would be guilty of a breach of privilege, because it is expressly so declared by the Constitution; if the member thus arrested had written to the high sheriff himself, informing him of the circumstance, and stating to him that the privileges of the House had been violated, requiring him to instruct his officer as to the impropriety of his conduct, with the view of preventing similar offences in future, would any one here have said that this was a breach of privilege, or would they not rather have commended the member for treating the officer with so much mildness and liberality? Would it have been thought preferable to arraign the officer at the bar of this House, to fine and imprison him for the commission of an act which in all probability arose from ignorance and misconception? Sir, I believe such conduct on the part of a member would have been thought cruel and oppressive, and would have been exclaimed against by all who became acquainted with the fact. Or, I would ask, if every man is chargeable with a violation of that duty which he owes to society, if he neglects to bring to punishment every one who in the heat of the moment may be guilty of a petty assault and battery? I confess I think otherwise, for I have always been of opinion that a mutual forbearance among men was necessary to preserve the harmony of society. It was the prevalence of this temper which prevented other members who were witnesses of the fact from bringing the business before this House, and if Mr. Randolph is guilty of a breach of privilege in making application to the President, every other member acquainted with the circumstance became equally guilty, by not applying to the House for the means of punishment; for it was as much the duty of those who were present as it was the duty of Mr. Randolph; all, as members of the Legislative body, being equally interested.

However, sir, let us recur again to this clause, and see whether the position of the committee may not be turned upon themselves. The committee have declared in their preamble that Mr. Randolph was guilty of a breach of privilege, in not making application to this House to punish the officers; and yet the committee themselves, notwithstanding they had these impressions, have introduced no affirmative proposition for the purpose of censuring or punishing Mr. Randolph. If it is the duty of members who believe that a breach of privilege has been committed, to apply to the House to remedy the evil, it was certainly the duty of this committee to introduce an affirmative proposition on this head, in order that the House might express their opinions on the subject, and punish or acquit, as their judgments might dictate. By neglecting to do this, if Mr. Randolph is guilty of a breach of privilege, the committee are equally guilty also.

As to myself, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in declaring that I never did wish these young men to be punished with severity. I am willing to believe that their conduct was the result of youthful indiscretion, and as such might well have been overlooked by this House, leaving it to the President to have them informed that they had behaved improperly, and that a recurrence of similar misconduct would be attended with more serious consequences to them. Sir, I do not now wish them to be punished with severity; but as this business is brought before the House, I hold it to be our duty to decide upon it in such a manner as to produce a good effect upon the military of the country. I conceive this to be our duty, because I think our rights and the rights of the people are deeply involved, and because I think it rests with us at this moment either to surrender or to support the freedom of debate, which is one of our most essential privileges. If we pass over this instance, without declaring our sense of its impropriety, I know not how far the evil may extend itself.

Although it has been denied by some, yet it has been admitted by other gentlemen in this House, that if the words were spoken with an intention to insult, and it was proved that the insult had taken place, this would be a breach of privilege. This, sir, I take to be the correct ground, for, independent of the admission of gentlemen, a variety of instances might be adduced from the Parliamentary history of England where persons not members have been punished for words spoken to and of members.

The question then is, how these words were used by the officers, and how they were intended to apply; and whether, by the use of them and the subsequent conduct afterwards, it is not apparent that they intended to insult, for the purpose of provoking hostilities?

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, no stronger argument can be adduced than the impressions which were made upon the bystanders. And here, sir, I cannot avoid noticing a remark which fell from the gentleman from Delaware, and which I regret exceedingly the use of. That gentleman thought it probable that the members present at the transaction were governed in their feelings by the peculiarity of their relative situation to Mr. Randolph, insinuating very strongly that their impressions arose from the similarity of their own and Mr. Randolph's political cast. [Mr. BAYARD said he did not mean to insinuate that any member was governed by motives of that kind, but spoke of it as a natural and involuntary bias of the human mind.] Mr. NICHOLSON said he trusted that the member had no such meaning. He flattered himself that the characters of those who were present were superior to such imputations, for although he himself had not thought proper to state his impressions in his affidavit, yet he could not avoid feeling for those who had; and he thought it very fair to suppose that those four members of the committee who had agreed to the report, in opposition to three of their brethren, were influenced by similar feelings. Those four gentlemen, said Mr. N., have testified, by their conduct here, their strong attachment to the Army; they have expressed a fellow-feeling for the officers, and one of them at least had on this floor warmly declared his disapprobation of the language used by my friend from Virginia. May we not believe, then, that these gentlemen were influenced in their examination of this subject, by their attachment to the army, and their disapprobation of Mr. Randolph's words? May we not suppose that their judgments were blinded by their feelings, and that this report is the production of party spirit? I do not charge the gentlemen with this, but it is certainly equally probable that they should be governed by their feelings, as well as those who were acting upon oath. But, sir, how will the gentleman from Delaware account for the impressions made by the conduct of the officers on the mind of Mr. Van Rensselaer? He was no member of this House. He does not agree with us in political opinions. His judgment was not warped by party feelings or considerations. He does not "view Executive conduct with an eye of jealousy." And yet we are told by Mr. Macon, who I presume the gentleman will not say misstated a fact, that Mr. Van Rensselaer was the first who mentioned the subject, by telling him that these officers intended to insult Mr. Randolph. He saw the tendency of their improper behaviour and expressed his opinion on it instantly. His impressions were the result of what he saw, and could not be produced by a sympathy of political feelings.

How will the member from Delaware account for the impressions of the person who went to a distant box and told Captain Smith that it was the intention of the officers to insult Mr. Randolph! If the committee had taken the trouble to inquire (and I find the question was not asked of any person) they would have found that this was a man of respectability, bearing the exclusive title of a Federalist, and one of the warm supporters of the Federal candidate at the late election for a Governor of this State. He could have no feelings to influence him. He could have no attachment to Mr. Randolph, to whom he was a perfect stranger. His motives could only have been of the purest and most disinterested nature. He had no party malevolence to gratify, no personal attachments to interest him; he was unknown to all parties, and the fair presumption is, therefore, that he was perfectly impartial. And yet we find that he was under strong apprehensions that disagreeable consequences might ensue, and went to Captain Smith for the purpose of inducing him to interfere, presuming, I suppose, that he might have influence with his brother officers. How will the member from Delaware account for the impressions made on the mind of that man who told Mr. Christie not to leave Mr. Randolph, for some injury was intended towards him? He had no acquaintance with Mr. Randolph, had no feelings to gratify that we know of, and yet he could see the same impropriety of behaviour in the officers, and was impressed with the same opinions which other gentlemen entertained.

But it was insinuated that a report had been rung about the House by the friends of Mr. Randolph, and that the impressions were created in this manner. [Mr. BAYARD explained. He said he did not mean to charge the friends of Mr. Randolph with having done so, for he believed they had not; but that it was done by other persons.] Mr. NICHOLSON said this strengthened his argument, for it would not be contended by the member from Delaware that this report could have been circulated before the conversation had taken place in the box, for this would prove a premeditated design; it was not contended that the report was circulated by any of those members who were in the box with Mr. Randolph; and this clearly proves that the same impressions were made on all persons who were in hearing.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Although I will not say, sir, that the House are bound to decide agreeably to these impressions, yet I will say that impressions so general, opinions so correspondent, could not have been formed by such a variety of men, who were witnesses of the scene, and could see the manner and countenances of the persons concerned, unless the intention was so strongly marked by their conduct as not to leave the possibility of a doubt. In my mind, an argument arising from the generality of the impression is irresistible in its nature, and must carry conviction with it.

As the testimony is in the possession of every member here, I shall offer very few observations upon it; but it appears to me that there are some strong outlines which deserve to be remarked on. Let it be remembered, sir, that Mr. Christie was in a situation to hear and see more than any other person whose testimony has been offered, and he has to-day stated that he was induced to observe these officers with more attention, because he heard several, either of the Army or Navy, declare, in the morning, that "Mr. Randolph ought to have his neck broke; that the officers ought to single themselves out and challenge him by turns until some of them killed him;" with other language to the same amount. This accounts for his suspicions of their intention, when he heard some person tell them they were not near enough to Mr. R., and they had better go nearer, as he could not hear them. The member from Delaware has said, that the committee were anxious to find out who this person was, and this is the only remark he made upon it. But it does not appear that they were anxious, for by examining the depositions it will be found that Lieutenant Thompson was the only person of whom the inquiry was made. He did not hear it, but it does not follow from thence that the words were not spoken. The committee neglected to put this question to the only two men from whom, in all probability, they could have received the requisite information; and these were Mr. Hurst and Captain Taylor. I have very little doubt, sir, but that Captain Taylor was the man who used these expressions; for Mr. Christie informs you that he was with the officers, and appeared extremely anxious to forward their views. If, then, the words were spoken, will gentlemen undertake to explain their tendency? They must have meant something, and we have every reason to believe that they were intended to induce a removal nearer to Mr. Randolph's situation, for we find Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds immediately changing their position and removing to the same box where Mr. Randolph was, getting so near to him as to touch him. The subsequent language was sufficiently provocative, and must have been directed to Mr. Randolph, as there was no other person there whose feelings could be wounded by the expressions, "black Virginia ragamuffins." But the member from Massachusetts (Mr. SEWALL) thinks that Mr. Randolph ought to have asked an explanation of the officers, with the view of obtaining certain information as to their intentions, and this information might have been used as unequivocal evidence of their designs. Such conduct, sir, may be consistent with the cool, calculating cunning of a Northern climate, but is entirely inconsistent with the open manly character of Virginia. [Here there was a call to order from several parts of the House. Mr. N. asked why he was called to order? Mr. RUTLEDGE said it was certainly very much out of order to draw comparisons between different States.] Mr. N. said he meant to make no comparison between States, but merely to notice a distinction which he had always understood did actually exist between the inhabitants of Northern and Southern climates. If Mr. Randolph had required an explanation at all, it would have been with other views than those of procuring testimony, which might have produced very serious consequences. But he discovered a temper and moderation which did him great honor, until their conduct was such as to violate all decorum, and he found it impossible to submit any longer without retorting.

Gentlemen seem to think the circumstance of laying hold of and violently jerking Mr. Randolph's coat as very slight and trivial. They have attempted to explain it away by saying that Mr. McKnight gently laid his hand on his shoulder for the purpose of passing him with more ease, and that this was construed by Mr. Randolph into a violent jerk. But, sir, is it possible that Mr. Randolph should have so far forgotten himself, that he should so far have abandoned that principle of moderation which he had suffered himself to be governed by, and which alone had prevented him from resenting their conduct, as to call a man a puppy for a slight and accidental touch of his coat, or for gently putting his hand upon his shoulder? He had already submitted to too much insult during the evening, which he treated with the proper contempt, and it cannot be supposed that his indignation, which had not been roused by insolent language, should afterwards take fire on the slight and trivial ground of being by mere chance accidentally touched by a person passing him in the theatre. If the act was not more flagrant than that contended for, is it possible that he could have construed it into violence? Or can it be imagined that he, who had the moment before looked with an eye of cool contemptuous dignity on his adversaries, would at once become warm and impetuous, unless he was driven to it by conduct of strong and marked hostility towards his person? This, sir, would have bespoke a light petulance of disposition which I can inform those gentlemen who now advocate this report, constitutes no part of his character; and I think the circumstance of his calling the person a puppy furnishes powerful evidence to convince us that the act itself was of uncommon violence.

But, sir, Captain McKnight does not tell us where or how he heard of Mr. Randolph having used the words "mercenaries" and "ragamuffins" in debate. He will not deny that he had heard it, for he will not pretend to say that his using them was merely accidental, and without reference to Mr. Randolph. The officers of the army are not in the habit of expressing themselves in opprobrious terms towards each other; they do not call their brethren "mercenaries" and "rag-amuffins," for it is a language that would not be tolerated among them, and would produce endless quarrelling and disagreement. The words, then, must have been intended for Mr. Randolph. Captain McKnight has accounted very minutely for the whole of his time from his arrival in town until he went to the theatre. He came to the city about twelve o'clock, was immediately ordered on a court martial, which was not discharged till three; from thence he went to his lodgings, and did not leave them till he came to the theatre, at six o'clock. Here the whole of his time is accounted for, and no mention made of his having heard of Mr. Randolph's expressions about the army. But, sir, we are told by Lieutenant Thompson that McKnight, with himself and several others, went in the interval between the play and the entertainment to sup at an adjoining tavern, and here, sir, I presume the thing was talked over; I will not say premeditated, because I do not believe there was any regular plan of insult laid, or we should have heard it from Lieutenant Thompson, whose testimony is, I think, very correct; but in all probability Mr. Randolph's expressions in debate were then mentioned; a general coincidence of sentiment prevailed among them, as officers, that they were insulted and were bound to resent the affront; and no doubt a conversation similar to that spoken of to-day by Mr. Christie took place, "that Randolph's neck ought to be broken, and that some of the officers ought to shoot him." Under the impressions produced immediately by this conversation, and perhaps somewhat heated with wine, they returned to the theatre, and the exhibition before them furnished an opportunity of provoking Mr. Randolph in such a manner as they thought would produce a correspondent conduct on his part, which might justify the most indignant outrage that they wished to offer.

With this view of the testimony, therefore, and taking into consideration that none of the facts are denied either in Captain McKnight's or Lieutenant Reynolds's statements, I shall vote for a recommitment of this report, for the purpose of changing the nature of the preamble, and so modifying the resolutions as to express our disapprobation of their conduct, and slightly to reprimand them for what I consider only as an indiscretion, but an indiscretion of a very improper nature, and of the most dangerous tendency. If I could suppose that this affair was the result of a premeditated design, I should be inclined to punish it with great severity.

Mr. OTIS said, the whole tenor of the arguments of gentlemen in opposition to the report of the committee appears to be directed not against the resolutions but against the preamble to the resolutions. If the preamble had not been reported, he believed that no great objections would have been urged against the resolutions, yet was there no necessary connexion between them, nor any reason for recommitting the whole report, because that part of it on which the House was not called to act might be liable to objections. It was also unnecessary on the ground of procuring the attestation of the gentleman from Virginia to his own statement, for it might easily be converted into an affidavit without that formality. But, said he, though it does not follow that the agreement to the resolutions is an approbation of the reasons assigned by the committee, yet to recommit the report would imply a direct censure of those reasons. Gentlemen may be convinced of the propriety of the resolutions without assenting to the reasoning contained in the preamble. That reasoning has been exhibited by the committee as the inducement which led them to propound the resolutions; but other minds may perhaps arrive at the same conclusions from a very different view of the subject. The same resolutions might have resulted from other premises, and the same premises might have warranted, in the opinions of some gentlemen, other resolutions. By deciding upon the foundation of its own merits, by recommitting the report, we decide upon the preamble, and decide against it.

For his own part, he was persuaded that much of the sensibility discovered on this occasion arose from a misconstruction of the report, and a prevalent opinion that it contained a direct and heavy censure upon the gentleman from Virginia. He denied the truth of this inference. The objections to the preamble may be referred to two points: the one comprising the allusions made to the style of Mr. Randolph's letter; the other, the exclusive cognizance claimed for the House in all matters of privilege respecting its members.

As to the first of these objections, he denied that the report contained a direct affirmation of censure upon the style or conduct of the gentleman, but it merely left the subject where it was, open to the opinion of every individual. As members of the committee, they express their regret that the gentleman has deviated from the forms of decorum customary in official communications to the Chief Magistrate. They do not deny his right to do so. They do not say he has been guilty of indecorum, or that he has not substituted other forms of decorum in the place of those which are usual. Upon this subject all are at liberty to form an opinion, and, from what has already transpired, we know that a variety of sentiment exists. Still, the committee may regret this departure from the customary style of writing to the Chief Magistrate; they may apprehend that it may lead to inconveniences. But other gentlemen, who think it not a matter of regret, and who have no fears lest the harmony of the different branches of the Government should be endangered by it, may still, consistently with their sentiments, vote for the resolutions. He would not, however, conceal his opinion, which actually accorded with that of the committee, that it was to be regretted that the gentleman had thus departed from the usual mode of addressing the President. It was true, indeed, that no precise forms were required by the Constitution or by the laws, and from the nature of language some variety of expression must always be found in the style and direction of different persons, but yet it would appear, upon examination, that the style of this letter was quite new and peculiar. [Mr. O. here read Mr. Randolph's letter in part.] The gentleman, said he, considers himself as holding, in common with the President, the station of servant to the same sovereign people. What is the meaning of the word servant? Grant that, in political treatises, this word is sometimes affectively applied to magistrates and public officers, as importing that they are appointed for the benefit of the people, yet this is not the ordinary acceptation of the word. Its usual meaning is, a menial person employed for hire. At best, it is an equivocal expression, quite unusual and unnecessary; and why should we adopt, in our communications with the Executive, words that are liable to a possible misconstruction? Again, this word is inaccurately used, in whatever sense it is considered. For the gentleman from Virginia is not a servant in common with the President. Their offices are perfectly distinct. If both are servants the President is certainly a servant of a higher grade than any member of this House. He holds an office of greater trust, of higher responsibility. It is not, therefore, customary or correct to put both upon the same level. The letter proceeds: "disclaiming all pretensions to make any application which, in the general estimation of men, requires the preface of apology," &c. This, again, is unusual. To what species of application does the gentleman allude? Probably to applications for office or preferment. It is happy for the gentleman that his circumstances do not make it necessary or convenient for him to solicit any favor of this kind; but why thus formally disclaim his pretensions? Standing upon the same ground, and enjoying the same right, with other citizens, might it not seem to imply a belief that his political opinions would be considered as an obstacle to his pretensions, and that offices are distributed through favor and affection? Is it usual to say to the President, "I come to ask no favors?" "I seek no office in your gift?" Certainly it is not. But does the committee declare this language to be indecorous? Do they reproach the gentleman for using it, or deny his right to use it? No! They say it is not customary, and surely no man will say it is.

Mr. O. then referred to the last part of the letter, "In their name (the Legislature*) I demand 'that a provision commensurate with the evil be made,' &c. What is the meaning of the word demand, in our language? One definition of it may be to ask, to require; perhaps the gentleman might simply intend the idea conveyed by the French words je demande; but is this the ordinary acceptation of this word? I appeal to the experience of gentlemen to decide, whether it does not import not merely a request, but a right to expect, and even an authority to compel, satisfaction.

The term is peremptory in its most ordinary use. This, then, is at least an equivocal mode of address, and a deviation from the customary tenor of official communications.

The last clause of the letter is equally singular: "In addressing you in the plain language of man, I give you, sir, the best proof I can afford of the estimation in which I hold your office and your understanding." It was, he conceived, uncommon and improper, in addressing the President, to comment upon his understanding. If by one his understanding be appreciated, it may be undervalued by another; one gentleman may profess to hold it in high estimation, another may assign it a less elevated grade. It could not be necessary to dwell upon the unpleasant consequences of discussions of this nature. Suffice it to say, with the committee, that the style is unusual and a subject of regret.

The second opinion of the committee, by which they had also given umbrage, was that in which they claim for the House an exclusive cognizance of all complaints for a breach of privilege. They assert that this application to the President, however intended, is derogatory from the rights and privileges of the House. There can be no doubt of the right and propriety of referring to the Commander-in-Chief, complaints of flagrant misconduct in any officer under his command, that due inquiry may be ordered, and a just censure or punishment awarded by a military court. But when the essence of the injury is made to consist in a violation of privilege, and the complaint is instituted on that ground, this House is the only tribunal to which the application should be made. If the gentleman had complained merely as an individual, without any reference to his station, or without considering the affront as offered to him in his official capacity, his letter probably would not have been submitted to the inspection of the House. He has not, however, taken this course; he considers the rights of the Legislature violated in his person; it is as a representative of the people that he demands redress; and, consequently, the committee, without charging him with a want of respect for the privileges of the House, content themselves with a declaration of their sentiments upon the mere question of the jurisdiction of the House.

In concluding his observations upon this head, he said that he could not forbear to advert to that part of the letter in which the gentleman professes to address the President in the "plain language of man." This expression seems naturally to imply that the President, being merely a man, is entitled to no distinction or peculiar marks of respect which are not due to his fellow-men. It is true that we live in a country in which the distinctions of rank and title are the voluntary tribute of civility to office and merit; yet, in the intercourse of life, both precedence and appellations of courtesy were dictated by our feelings and our habits. He had no doubt but the gentleman from Maryland, in his private conversation and manners, was an attentive observer of these forms; in addressing a gentleman he used the word sir, which was in itself a title, and that, when he intended no offence, he refrained from the use of words which conveyed at least a doubtful meaning. And wherein consists the mischief of this civility? Is it not more than innocent, is it not salutary and productive of harmony and pleasure? In a Republic, where the Chief Magistrate is elective, and the dignity of his character is upheld, not like that of a monarch by the splendor of his station, or the compulsive homage of his subjects, but by the esteem of his constituents and the strength of public opinion, it is an incumbent duty to demonstrate, by all ordinary means, our respect for the character and the office. If in addressing the President we should waive all ceremony, and dispense with all forms of decorum, we cannot claim from him a more respectful attention in his addresses to the Legislative body, and by diminishing his weight and importance in the eyes of the community, we should also impair our own.

In regard to the evidence upon which the resolutions were predicated, Mr. O. wished that it had been reserved for a distinct inquiry, and not involved with the question of commitment; but, as the gentleman from Virginia had proceeded at large into the examination of the evidence, and had been followed by others, he requested indulgence for a few remarks upon this point. The evidence naturally resolved itself into two parts—as it regards overt acts, and as it regards words. Without attempting to settle abstract questions of privilege or alluding to imaginary cases, he thought that the attention of gentlemen might safely be confined to two positions, arising from the circumstances of this particular transaction. First, that if the overt acts alleged against the officers were done with an intention to insult Mr. Randolph, they must, in connexion with the words spoken, be deemed a high and flagrant breach of privilege. Secondly, that the words proved to be spoken, if not accompanied with any overt act, with any insulting or menacing gestures, much less if not addressed to the member himself, could not be deemed a violation of privilege.

Let us then inquire, said he, into the nature of those acts which are imputed to the officers. There are two of them only upon which a reliance is placed. It is said that Mr. Reynolds crowded himself into a seat at the theatre in such a manner as to jostle and even to hurt Mr. Randolph, with an avowed intent to insult him, and that Captain McKnight pulled him violently by the coat, in coming out of the theatre. With respect to the first of these accusations, the question was not whether it might possibly be true, but whether the evidence of its being so, was satisfactory. It is indeed barely possible that Mr. Reynolds intended to affront Mr. Randolph by this mode of taking a seat at his side, but many circumstances render it doubtful and improbable. Had the impression since made upon that gentleman's mind been conveyed by the action itself, he would probably have demanded an explanation, as he afterwards did, when he felt himself pulled by the coat; his omission to do this, convinced him that he must have considered the conduct of Captain Reynolds as ambiguous at most. There was nothing unusual in his occupation of a vacant seat; although the space was small it had been sufficient for Mr. Christie, a moment before, and if Mr. Rensselaer, who was leaning on the same seat, had resumed an upright position, it would have been still enlarged. In the public boxes at the theatre this change of places is incessant. The spectators, intent upon amusement, are often regardless of the punctillios of good breeding; every man is elbowed and jostled in turn; and can the House, sitting as judges in their own case, venture to decide that an ordinary occurrence of this kind affords proof of a design to affront the gentleman from Virginia; that it amounts to a breach of privilege?

The next overt act, said he, is the pull by the coat which Mr. Randolph felt and noticed in coming from the theatre. The first question is by whom this was done? The only evidence that fixes this act upon any individual is derived from Mr. McKnight himself; but this evidence, which confesses the probability of the act, also explains it. He declares that being violently pulled or pushed by others he merely put out his hand to save himself or to make room. The various parts of this relation must be taken together, and is it not a probable account of the affair? It is proved that at this time one of his arms was locked under the arm of Mr. Taylor. Would he have chosen this situation, if his intention was to commit an act of violence? Or would he not naturally expect an attack and have kept his arms at liberty to defend himself? It has already been urged that Mr. McKnight had a fair occasion of commencing a fracas when Mr. Randolph called the person who touched him a puppy, had this been his intention. To this it has been answered that he immediately passed by, and probably did not hear him. But why did he pass by, why not stop to hear him? If he was desirous of a quarrel why should he avoid Mr. Randolph? It has not been pretended that the officers intended to commit a secret outrage, to insult the member by stealth, and skulk out of his reach. On the contrary, the attempt has been to prove a design to bring on an open quarrel and riot, and affront him in the view of all the spectators. This evidence therefore labors under the same defect with the former, and is too equivocal for censure or punishment. Leaving, then, the overt acts, the injury complained of is reduced merely to the words spoken by the officers. Mr. O. said, that for the sake of argument he would admit that these words were spoken in the hearing of the gentleman from Virginia, in token of their disapprobation of the language used by him in the House, and that they were willing he should understand the displeasure they had conceived on this account. Still the words were not addressed to that gentleman, they were not accompanied with looks or gestures of insult or defiance, they were not uttered in a manner that could justify his taking notice of them. The question then arises, whether a mere repetition of words used by a member in debate, in his hearing, significant only of the disapprobation of the speaker, furnishes a ground for the interference of this House. Certainly the doctrine cannot be admitted in this latitude; even this conduct in those officers might be improper and indiscreet; its remote tendency might have been injurious and leading to a breach of privilege, but did not actually amount to it. Suppose these words had been repeated from the galleries by a number of soldiers or other persons, would this House have thought proper to arraign them for a breach of privilege? On the whole, therefore, Mr. O. concluded, that a very concise statement of the results of the evidence must be sufficient to convince gentlemen that the resolutions as reported were warranted and supported, and that the report ought not to be recommitteed.

Mr. H. LEE, sensible that the discussion had extended far enough, said he should not have occupied a moment of the time of the House, had not the subject been placed in a position which, it struck him, was exceedingly unfavorable to a right understanding of it. Instead of openly confessing, at once, the great objections they had to the report, and treating only on the reasons which operated with the committee on which to found the resolutions, gentlemen had extended their observations to the whole subject, unconnected as was one part with another, in the light the motion had placed it, although the whole report and the resolutions had been discussed. The only question now was, whether the committee had exceeded the boundaries of the duty prescribed to them. Those gentlemen who thought they had, would vote for the amendment; but by that act they would tell the committee that they had done what they ought not to have done. On the other hand, if a majority should be found to vote against the recommitment, they would tell the committee that no part of their conduct merited the censure of the House. In this view the subject was now placed, and simply so.

However he might differ, Mr. L. said, with the committee in one of their resolutions, yet he was bound to declare that he coincided entirely with them in their report; so far as he understood the rules of the House, they had not exceeded their power and duty by stating the reasons whereupon they acted. Had they shrunk from this task, feeling the conviction they have uttered, they would have merited the reprobation of the House, because they would not have done their duty. Had not a member from Virginia told the House that the committee uttered opinions unsubstantiated by evidence, and unsupported by facts? If the report was to be recommitteed, it would be at once applying to the committee that censure which the observations of the gentleman were calculated to convey, and this censure would bear with redoubled force, because sanctioned by the House.

Mr. L. said he could not help observing that in the whole course of this discussion gentlemen were very delicate with respect to the conduct of an individual, lest a censure might be cast on him, but it was remarkable that in the same breath they were not cautious as to censuring a very respectable committee of the House? He was not desirous of censuring either a committee or any individual member of the House, except justice and duty combined to require it, but to the impulse of duty he trusted he ever should be susceptible.

What, Mr. L. asked, have the committee done to merit your censure? They have told you in language the most delicate, that they think the letter written by the member to the President is a deviation from that decorum which ought to be observed, and which is essential to harmony in the Government. Is there a man here who doubts the sincerity of the committee in this particular opinion? If they believed so, it was their bounden duty to make the declaration; and if they ought to say it, in what language could they convey it with more delicacy than they have done? Shall a censure be cast upon them, and for what?

Mr. L. then read the report and the first part of the letter, in order to examine whether the opinion suggested by the committee was not well founded. What he asked could the word "servant," in the letter, mean? A servant was well known to be a person in low condition, and one over whom a command was existing. He did not view this very indecorous language as applying to the President in his individual capacity, but to the representative of the people, and in that view he considered not the man but the majesty of the people concerned. How would the people look on this indecorous and degrading treatment of their Chief Magistrate! If the Chief Magistrate was addressed in an undue manner, it could not be improper for the representatives of the people to express an opinion thereupon. Indeed there would be a deficiency in the execution of their duty, were they to neglect it. He considered the end of all Governments ought to be the happiness of the people, he considered it peculiarly so in a representative Government like ours, where all the power of the Government was immediately and necessarily drawn from the people. When he looked at the President, as Chief Magistrate of the Union, and acting by their choice he saw in him the people, when he looked at the Senate, or at the House of Representatives, he also saw in them the people, because the whole of the power possessed by either, and all the branches, were derived from the people, for whom they acted. He would always give his dissent to any and every measure which went to disparage the organs of the people. It was upon this ground that he considered the language of the letter indecorous and improper, to be used by any man to either branch of the Government.

"In their name, I demand," &c. Suppose the President of the United States was to send a Message to this House couched in language like this, how, Mr. L. asked, would gentlemen feel it? How would my colleague himself, or his colleague in opinion (Mr. NICHOLSON) feel it? I should consider the President as committing a deep insult on the majesty of the people. Is he not situated as we are? Does he not derive his situation from the same source as we do? Then surely if we should be justifiable in feeling the offence, he has a right to be so, and we may presume he does feel it; but he has too much good sense to feel it in his individual capacity, he must however feel it in his representative character.

"I demand."—When I say this, what meaning do I convey? It implies that I have very great reason to suspect you will not do the thing in question, but which you have a right to do. On what ground I would ask, did the gentleman suppose that the Chief Magistrate would not do what he ought? Surely no gentleman can say this is decent language; no gentleman but the gentleman from Maryland has pretended to approve of it. I did not think that there was a man in the House who would have used it, but there is one who admires this extraordinary style; happily that does not prove the consistency or propriety of it.

As to the word "fellow-citizen," Mr. L. thought it was decent; he could see no objection to it, because it was truth, and conveyed no improper idea, but when he heard expressions used which conveyed impressions that the President would not do his duty, rather than think of censuring, he should, for one, think himself bound to thank the committee for noticing it, and at the same time he could not avoid admiring the moderation exemplified in their delicacy of the expression of those feelings.

Mr. L. asked, whether decorum of behaviour between man and man did not go to uphold human happiness, and peace and good order in society? On the same ground the committee thought decorum was necessary to be preserved between the branches of the Government, in order to preserve the happiness of the people. Would the gentlemen from Virginia or Maryland, if they met a lady in the street, address her by the plain epithet of woman? No, they would know it was an offence, and would avoid such language; they certainly would address her in the customary style. If you beat down these barriers, who can trace the consequences? He considered that all these means to cultivation, small as they may appear, ought to be considered important, for the surest road to overturn a Government was to encourage innovations upon good order and decorum. Upon this ground, Mr. L. said, he was inimical to introducing any new mode of speaking or acting, since the customary one had been found to answer good purposes, and no fault had ever been found with it.

Mr. L. then made some observations in support of the consistency of Mr. BAYARD in his remarks, and in his examination of the testimony, which by another gentleman (Mr. NICHOLSON) had been supposed to bear an inconsistent aspect.

He further observed that, though it was his desire the observations should be confined to the report, yet as the testimony had been introduced, he would go on and make a few remarks on the resolutions.

With respect to the first, he supposed there would be but little, if any, difference of opinion. He could not think it possible for the most ingenious members in the House to argue for a moment against the propriety of the conduct of the President, and his merit of the approbatory declaration of the House for submitting the letter, in the most respectful manner, where alone he considered the right of privilege to exist. Supposing that a large majority would concur in this opinion, it was unnecessary to occupy a moment in speaking on it.

But this was not his opinion with respect to the second resolution: he wished he could as readily and with as much propriety concur with the committee in their opinion respecting that.

Mr. L. said he viewed the rights and privileges of the House as forming a most important feature in that system of Government under which we live; he conceived every attempt, be it little or great, which went to debase those rights and privileges, as commanding the just displeasure of the House, and unless in this instance the amount of the evidence could be better done away than it had been, he was of opinion that this was one of those cases in which the House ought to show it. He thought it was plainly proved that the two officers now charged had been guilty of conduct which rendered an application for redress very necessary, and to refuse redress would be very improper. He would give his reasons:

In the evidence of Mr. Christie, (which was entitled to the highest credit,) it appeared that one said "go nearer, he does not hear you." This was said respecting Mr. Randolph; it showed very plainly that these two officers had designed to insult the member: to execute a design thus evinced, they did go into the box where he was, and continued using the words mercenary and ragamuffin. Unless it could be proved that they had no intention to give insult, Mr. L. said, he could not believe but they had; for merely because they did not go through with their design was no proof that nothing was done towards it. That argument of gentlemen was something like an argument used on the other side, during a debate for the reduction of the Army, that you are not to prepare against an invading army till they land on your coasts! The inconsistency of the doctrine must be readily perceived.

The intention, in my opinion, said Mr. L., is well proved, unless contradictory testimony can be produced; if proved, the dignity of this House, the feelings of this House, and the duty we owe to the people, all command us to say that it was an attack upon our privileges as their Representatives, and ought to be noticed.

Had these two gentlemen been common citizens, Mr. L. protested, he should have been willing to disregard the business; he should have been more willing to grant indulgence for overstepping the bounds of decorum in this matter, which, simply considered, was trifling; but with respect to gentlemen who held commissions under the President of the United States, it was their duty, as it ought to be their pride, to protect and respect every part of the Government; it was their duty to have interposed if they had perceived any insult offered to any member of this House, and in no case to take the lead in disorder. Valuing the honor of the Army, he thought it his duty to let gentlemen in that character know that more was expected from them than from other citizens, because, independent of their character and duty as citizens, they were called upon to protect the good order of society. But although he should vote against the last resolution, because it was proper to express a disapprobation of the conduct of these officers, he wished to express that disapprobation in as light a manner as possible, and in this opinion he hoped the House would concur.

When Mr. L. had concluded, the House adjourned.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the law passed the first of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen."

Ordered, That Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BRACE, and Mr. GALLATIN, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution, and that the said committee have power to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States, together with a letter from JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr., a member of this House for the State of Virginia, the motion under consideration being to recommit the report.

Mr. HARPER said he did not rise to follow some of the gentlemen who had risen yesterday, in their lengthy examination of the evidence, because he thought in that conduct they had strayed very far from the motion before the House, which he supposed was merely designed to recommit the preamble, because it was not worded to the liking of some gentlemen, as they could not debate on what was not an act of the House, but of a committee, the only way to show their dislike of it was to move its recommitment. This appeared to be the general opinion. But Mr. H. thought it was not in order to recommit the report at large, since any disapprobation which the House may desire to express could be conveyed by resolution, or the present resolutions may be altogether negatived.

However, since the motion had been to recommit, and since, in the discussion of that motion, the subject at large had been discussed, Mr. H. said he would just inform the House what he thought the most proper mode of proceeding.

He did not believe there was a breach of privilege in the present case; of this he was well satisfied in his own mind, and which he should feel no objection to explain, if the proper motion was before the House. He conceived it could not be objected that the resolution approving the conduct of the President was highly proper, on a presumption of which he should not enter into a defence of that resolution. He believed that the preamble to the report was very proper; that it went no farther than it ought to have gone, and that much credit was due to the committee for their moderation in the report they had produced. But though he was of opinion that a breach of privilege was not committed, he was also of opinion that the conduct of the officers was very indiscreet and highly improper.

He believed, since nothing appeared to contradict that opinion, that they came to the theatre without any design of insulting any person, and that they returned after they had gone out to supper without any such design; he believed, also, that when they made use of the expressions, it was done without any view of producing a quarrel. He believed it a mere indiscretion of youth, excited by the occasion that offered. It certainly ought to be noticed in some way or other, but Mr. H. did not think the repetition of mere words could amount to a breach of privilege, if not offensive in themselves, nor coupled with actions that were offensive. This he held to be a just principle. The words which are repeated must be in their own nature offensive, or, not being so, must be coupled with some action that is so, in order to amount to a breach of privilege. These words could not be offensive in their own nature, because the member used them in his seat, and used them without occasion. The mere repetition of these words, then, could not be criminal. This position, he thought, could be easily maintained by discussing the testimony, but he conceived it unnecessary. But Mr. H. considered the conduct of the officers improper and indiscreet, as before observed; though they might not have intended to produce a quarrel, yet it might have had that effect; as it might have produced much ferment they ought to have guarded against it. This idea he wished to express by a resolution somewhat to this effect, if the second resolution reported by the committee should be negatived. To insert the words "although the conduct of Captain McKnight and Lieutenant James Reynolds was indiscreet and improper, yet sufficient cause doth not appear for the interposition of the House on the ground of a breach of privilege."

Mr. H. did believe that this indiscretion had been fallen into, but it was not of a nature to require reprehension, much less punishment. He thought it one of those charges which would admit of extenuation, but he would not enter into it, because it appeared to the gentlemen who had spoken, generally, that the crime did not amount to much, and particularly so, since it must be acknowledged that provocation was given by the member in this House to that class of men. On these accounts he should vote against the recommitment; and if the second resolution should be negatived, he meant to move as a substitute the above in its place.

Mr. HARTLEY did not conceive that it would be passing a censure on the committee to recommit the report, though, for his part, he saw no necessity for that measure, since the House could express their whole desire in the resolutions. He thought the conduct of the officers at least indiscreet, and ought not to pass without some reprehension. The testimony of Mr. Christie, in his opinion, proved a complete insult. Certainly their behaviour was very rude and insolent to the gentleman; but he did not conceive it was a premeditated scheme. How far the irritation they might have felt could operate to excuse them from insulting a member on account of what he had said in the House, he could not say, but certainly some impropriety was attached to it, and therefore he could not, with the committee, vote for an entire excuse of their conduct.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said, he was of opinion the debate had taken a course it ought not; for most gentlemen had directed their arguments principally in support of the preamble or reasoning of the committee, and at the same time acknowledged that the House could not act on it. It was for this reason, he supposed, the member from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had made the motion to recommit the report of the committee.

He said the report presented two distinct subjects: one in relation to the application and style of the letter of Mr. Randolph to the President; the other in relation to the conduct of the officers, and charged to amount to a breach of privilege—yet the committee had thought proper to make a report in such manner as to deprive the House from having any kind of control over one-half its conduct in any other way than by the one proposed, and which is now contended to be equally an important part of the reference.

Mr. W. said he did not believe any intention was entertained by the House, in making the reference, that the committee should consider the style of the letter or manner of application, and that it was never thought of till hatched in the committee or elsewhere less public; for, as one of the committee, he knew it was a matter of doubt, even with the most anxious for the power, when first mentioned, and it was some time before a conclusion was had to that effect by the majority. He said he wished gentlemen to consider the conduct of the House, and the arguments made use of, in order to obtain a reference, and if they were to be relied on. The powers the committee had assumed were not contemplated or mentioned by any one. When the motion was made to raise the committee, the member from Virginia himself, who had been insulted, opposed it, and said he did not mean application with a view to a breach of privilege, and, if he had, he knew it ought to be made to the House. But gentlemen then urged it was a question in which the House and all its members were interested, and that there were a thousand considerations which might operate on the member injured, but which ought not on other members of the House; that having a knowledge of a breach of the privileges of the House, they ought to act.

If the committee considered this an important part of their duty, why did they not report accordingly, and in the usual form, something by way of resolutions, on which the House could act? Why did they not also report a resolution on the conduct of Mr. Randolph, (which it is now contended was referred to the committee,) instead of a train of irrelevant reasoning against him, and on one part of their duty, whereon to found resolutions on the other part to exculpate the officers offending? Thus he thought he was warranted in saying the committee had exceeded the objects of the reference, and that they were sensible of so doing, otherwise they would have reported substantially on both objects, which it is contended were referred.

Mr. W. said this was a question which of all others ought to have stood clear of an evil which found its way into almost every question that came before the House, he meant party; but, so far from this, certain gentlemen had taken occasion to invite it, in express terms and with a degree of triumph. He cautioned them to consider, that a question of privilege might operate as a two-edged weapon, and cut both ways.

He said, although he was one of the committee, he could not acknowledge himself under any obligations to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE,) for his defence of it; that gentlemen had stated, that the committee have a right to report what they thought, and to recommit the report would be a censure on them. He said it was the first time he ever heard the report of a committee defended on such grounds. Mr. W. said it was every day's practice for the House to disagree to reports of committees, and to recommit them too; and he never before knew any one to consider it a censure; indeed this same gentleman has expressed a desire and intention to amend the resolutions reported, so as to alter the substance, notwithstanding his extreme caution on the score of censuring the committee. Certainly this would be as much a censure as to recommit; the effect would be the same. In both cases it showed a disagreement of the House with the opinion of the committee; and that the committee had a right to report what they thought, he supposed every member of it and the House knew, and that the House also had a right to disagree to any report.

As to the objections made to the style and manner of the letter of Mr. Randolph, Mr. W. asked who, or what body had a right to point out any particular style, in which the President or any officer of the Government should be addressed? If a particular mode is necessary, it had better be stated by some legislative act, that all might know; yet even that might put it out of the power of some to address without offence, unless by the aid of those skilled in courtly etiquette.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

But, said Mr. W., is it not a little surprising to see gentlemen differ so widely among themselves on this subject? In attacking the style of this letter, one gentleman, from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) had found fault with the word "fellow-citizen;" another, from Massachusetts, (Mr. OTIS,) thought "servant" a very improper epithet for the President; and a third (Mr. LEE) considered the words "I demand" as improper and rude. All those gentlemen had undertaken to point out the offensive parts of the letter of Mr. Randolph, and yet no two agreed. This, sir, shows the absurdity of any attempt of the kind, and that those gentlemen could not agree on this subject were they to set about it. But, said Mr. W., is this a proper subject for the House to act on? Have we a right to dictate the language or style of any man, and how he should address the President? Admitting, for the sake of argument, (and that only,) that this letter had been written in a style not altogether decent, what have this House to do concerning it? Suppose any other person had written a letter to the President, not decorous, ought this House, or could they consistently take cognizance of it, in case the President should think proper to communicate it by way of message? Certainly not. If an offence is offered to the President by any person, the laws are sufficient to protect him, and punish the offenders, and not this House. We have no power to protect or punish any person, except by laws which shall operate equally on all.

Mr. W. said he agreed with the member from Massachusetts, (Mr. SEWALL,) in his position, that this House ought to be cautious in exercising its powers on questions of privilege, and he believed there were few members in the House as relax on those points as himself. That gentleman had also warned the House against casting a censure on the conduct of these officers in a doubtful case, and when their intention to insult is not clearly ascertained. Why does he not extend this principle also to the other side of the question, as relating to Mr. Randolph? Is there any evidence that he intended to insult the President, even if his language in the letter was capable of it? And can that gentleman, by any possible construction, make the case more than doubtful? Yet we see him wishing to cast the strongest censure on Mr. Randolph, (the person insulted,) and at the same time willing to exonerate the persons insulting altogether. He said this was a disposition which he could not very well account for on proper principles.

Mr. W. said, with respect to the words used by the officers, his opinion was expressed in the report of the committee: that they might have been produced more from the occasion at the theatre, than from any direct intention to insult; therefore not worthy to be considered of by the House, on the ground of privilege. He should not go into an investigation and comparison of the evidence in the case, as some gentlemen had done, because he thought it did not comport with the dignity of the House to attend hours together on gentlemen in seeking up and explaining evidence, which was short, and which every member had on his desk, and because he supposed them all capable to judge of it

Mr. W. concluded by saying he had endeavored to confine his observations to the question of recommitment, which he hoped the House would agree to; because the report was, in his opinion, uncandid, inasmuch as it tended to cast a censure on Mr. Randolph, and was so calculated, that the House could not express its opinion on that part in any other way, unless to approve, for the rules of the House did not admit of the amendment to that part.

Mr. EDMOND did not conceive the committee could give any new opinion upon the papers, if they were to be recommitted to them. At the desire of the House, they had considered the letter, as well as the Message of the President. From all the facts which had appeared before them, they undoubtedly thought themselves bound to make a report. What more could be expected from them, if they were to take it back? If it were to be referred to another committee, another opinion would probably be given; was it probable that would also meet with opposition on account of the difference of opinions entertained in the House?—if so, no advantage could be derived. The committee had given an opinion, but, Mr. E. said, that opinion would have no influence upon his mind. It was their duty to report, but the House were to be guided by that report no farther than their judgment should direct them; at least, that was the way in which he should act.

The report was considered a censure on the member who wrote the letter to the President, because its style was not proper. That the style of the letter was displeasing to the President, Mr. E. thought was clear enough: whether the President had a right or not to be displeased, he would not pretend to say, but it was not pleasing. The committee regretted that this should have existed, and they certainly were right, but that was no censure on the gentleman.

Farther, Mr. E. contended that the idea of the committee, that it was derogatory to the rights of the House to apply to the President, was accurate; it was a complete surrender of all the privileges of the House, out of its own hands, where the Constitution had placed them, because the gentleman did not appeal as an individual citizen, but as a member of the House. The facts stated in his letter were, that he had been insulted and abused for words of a general nature uttered in the House: he then went on, "it would be derogatory to your character, sir, for me to point out the remedy, which it is your province to provide." Here the complete surrender of the cognizance of the House is made to the President. But what made it more so, it was not in his own name he made the appeal; if he had, the House would have had nothing to do with it; no, it was in the name of the House he made the appeal and demanded a remedy. "The independence of the Legislature has been attacked, the majesty of the people, of which you are the principal representative, insulted, and your authority contemned; in their name I demand that a provision," &c.

[Mr. RANDOLPH said it was a misprint where the word "Legislature" was inserted; by a reference to the manuscript letter it would be found to be "Legislator." By a reference to the letter, it was found to read "the independence of the Legislator has been," &c.]

Whether this demand was made in the name of the people, or whether it was in the name of the Legislator and people, Mr. E. did not know; however, he conceived it made but little difference, since in his opinion the rights of the Legislature were surrendered to the Executive by the appeal, which certainly was to obtain a remedy he had no power to give, and, therefore, the committee were correct in saying it was derogatory to the rights of the House.

With respect to the resolutions, Mr. E. could see no reasons for recommitting, since the whole of the evidence on which they were formed was before the House; there could be no reason to explain this evidence anew. If any new evidence could be produced, or any new light derived, then it might possibly be an argument for recommitment, but, even then, it might as well be done in the House. Mr. E. did not see the necessity of going into the testimony; he did not consider the House like a jury, that he should arrogate to himself the right of summing up the evidence or laying down principles of law, of which they were as well able to judge as himself.

An idea was advanced that though this did not amount to a breach of privilege, yet some degree of blame was attached to the conduct of the officers, and some mode of censure ought to be taken. In answer to that, Mr. E. said, it was a breach of privilege, or it was not; if it was, it ought to be treated as such, and punished accordingly; there was no half way in the business, and the House could not take a step out of their province. It must be a crime, or it must not; if not, according to the rules of the House they had nothing to do with it.

An idea was advanced, (he thought by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. NICHOLSON,) that these gentlemen had been out to sup, and might have got a little warm with wine, and, therefore, might have proceeded a little farther than they intended. This was mentioned in exculpation of their crimes. This was a kind of apology which was very inconsistent with the rules of law. If a breach of privilege was committed, could this apology mitigate the crime? As he observed before, Mr. E. said, if the officers were guilty, the House ought to do itself justice in their punishment; if they were not, it ought to do them justice in acquitting them of every charge.

Mr. GALLATIN.—The report of the committee appears to embrace three things. First, an expression of respect and commendation of the President's conduct in submitting the subject of the letter to the House; secondly, an exculpation of the officers, and thirdly, a censure of Mr. Randolph for his conduct, not only as to the manner and style of the letter, but in regard to the appeal itself.

If the committee had, agreeably to the usual custom, laid before the House a number of resolutions deduced from the opinions expressed in their preamble, there would have been no occasion for the present motion to recommit the report: but they have now reported in a manner that precludes the possibility of an alteration in the House, and, therefore, the only way to come at the report is by recommitting it. The House are by this report prevented from giving an opinion, although the committee have thought themselves authorized to do it.

So far as relates to the two resolutions proposed, Mr. G. said he did not mean to give an opinion, because if the present motion was negatived, the House would then have them fairly before them; but, as there had been during the debate a general deviation from this strict adherence to order, and as he thought some of the facts merited an answer, he should indulge himself in the same with following them. We are told, said Mr. G., that by admitting the resolutions, we do not admit the reasoning upon which the resolutions are founded, or that the reasoning of the committee is only their own, and we cannot make it ours; but it will be found, upon perusing the second and fourth paragraphs of the report, (I will not call them reasonings, I will call them assertions or declarations,) if you precede them with the word resolved, they would be complete resolutions. The committee might have deducted these two resolutions. I will now ask why they did not introduce it in that form? I will suppose at this time that the committee had the full power to extend their ideas to every subject laid before them; if the committee thought they were justifiable in taking up the style and manner of appeal, they ought to have taken it up and acted upon it, but in such a manner as to enable the House to do the same. The letter was within the province of the House, or it was not; if it was, then it ought to have been reported on, so that the House could act on it, nay, it was the duty of the committee to do so: if it is not proper for the House, neither was it for the committee, and, therefore, it was uncommon and improper. That it was uncommon I think every man must acknowledge, when it is considered that a committee never reports upon more facts than are referred to them. It was improper, because it contains an indirect but easily distinguishable censure on Mr. Randolph, while it exculpates the two officers whose conduct was complained of.

To me, said Mr. G., this would be a sufficient reason to vote for its recommitment, because I cannot otherwise express my disapprobation at the censure exhibited against Mr. Randolph.

But I will go further—I will say that the report is objectionable, not only on account of the committee expressing declarations and assertions which they did not think proper to submit to the discussion of the House, but because their declarations are incorrect and unfounded in themselves.

In order to prove this position, Mr. G. proceeded to review the evidence. From which it appeared that these officers were at the theatre, first in an adjoining box to Mr. Randolph; that there they made use of words ostensibly pointed at him, and which could not but be taken by him as an insult; that their allusions not only went to him as a Virginian, but as a member of Congress—"they would be better drilled by the next session of Congress." These allusions were repeated several times by both the officers, and with a view of being heard by Mr. Randolph; that, after this, one of them took a seat close by Mr. Randolph, in a manner at least rude; that, at the end of the performances, one of them, being behind Mr. Randolph, was seen with his arm extended at the instant his coat was pulled, so that no doubt could remain but it was he that did the act.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

The question is, whether these facts amount to insult, or not; and this must be answered by discovering the intention of the party acting them. To me, said Mr. G., it does amount to insult; I draw my deductions from the facts themselves, and the impressions these facts made on the bystanders.

The facts speak for themselves. These words were repeated a variety of times, and, to leave it unquestionable, one said, "go nearer to him, he does not hear you." These words were followed by acts of violence. The whole of this together must prove some hostile intention. There cannot be a doubt that words alone amount to an insult, but it is left indubitable, if followed by actions. In order to evade the force of these concurrent circumstances, gentlemen have split the testimony into a number of pieces, and thus concluded they made nothing at all! But I conceive these pieces ought to be collected, if we wish to discover the truth; it is the whole mass of the facts united that must guide the decision of the House. And to this ought to be added the impressions those facts made on the bystanders, the minutæ of which they could not explain, but generally they could not but be impressed with their force. These impressions were not confined to members of this House; Mr. Van Rensselaer, of New York, and other gentlemen, did actually express their impressions to be such as left no room to doubt that insults were given.

It has been said that this committee exerted themselves to discover all the facts and all the evidence that could be had. I dare say they acted to the best of their knowledge, but they certainly forgot to examine a most important witness to the early part of the transactions of these officers. Captain Smith says, in his testimony, "a gentleman of our acquaintance came and informed me of what had happened above," &c. Did the committee ask Captain Smith who this gentleman was; in order to bring forward his testimony, because he must have known something? They did not. But was it not their duty to have known and sent for that gentleman? Certainly. This exhibits a considerable, nay, an important neglect on the part of the committee, because the impressions made on this gentleman's mind were such as excited him to wish the interference of Captain Smith. The committee did not pursue the testimony as far as they could, and as they ought to have done; but had they produced this gentleman they would have found him impressed with ideas similar to those of Mr. Christie, and others, though in political opinions very opposite. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, every doubt as to the intention of these officers must be dispersed upon a review of the testimony, and most particularly that of Mr. Christie. Unless I can be brought to disbelieve that gentleman's relation, I must believe there was insult committed, and that their intention was to insult. Can any person review the words and conduct of these men, and say there was no insult?

To be sure I cannot command the same impressions on the minds of other gentlemen which I receive myself, but I cannot see what ground there is for the conclusions of the committee, that all the facts were either satisfactorily explained, or of too equivocal a nature to merit notice. I do not know a single fact that has been satisfactorily explained; there are some of an equivocal nature, to be sure, that do not receive that degree of positive proof which may be necessary, but I do not see them explained away. If these gentlemen were innocent of any intention, one in forcing himself into the seat of Mr. Randolph, the other in pulling his coat, was it probable these acts would have so immediately followed the abusive words which they used, and which evidently were meant to insult that gentleman? This certainly must tend to increase the suspicions of any man who will observe the circumstances.

Although I state these impressions, said Mr. G., I would not say there was any premeditation, if by that word is meant a combination entered into beforehand, since it appears from evidence, that one of the officers had but very recently arrived in town. They certainly could not have known that Mr. Randolph could be there; but though willing to make every allowance in favor of the officers, I cannot say that Mr. Randolph received no insult.

I will now, sir, proceed to an examination of the charges exhibited by the committee against Mr. Randolph, in respect to his letter and application. The style of that letter has received a stronger appearance by the animadversions and explanations of some gentlemen than it will admit of; it has certainly received a strained meaning. But, before I come to the letter, permit me to say that in respect to the two paragraphs of their report, I do not agree with the members of the committee that no censure is included; on the contrary I think the censure very severe. The gentleman is not only charged with deviating from the customary forms of decorum in the style of his address to the Chief Magistrate, but he is charged with breaking the harmony that ought to subsist between the different branches of the Government, so far as he had it in his power. In what stronger language can this censure be couched than this? Let us see how far these charges are just. I wish the committee, in regard to the style of the letter, instead of being self-created avengers of the wounded feelings of the President, had imitated his example and forbore to make any comment on the style, and then they would have acted with that prudence their station called for.

"Servant to the same sovereign people." This is the first exceptionable part mentioned, and this was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it conveyed a kind of equality which he considered improper. Another gentleman said the word "servant" was objectionable, because it was susceptible of more than one meaning. It certainly has different meanings, but it is impossible to mistake the meaning intended in that letter; as it is there used, it is perfectly correct, and strictly Constitutional. The President, in the Constitution, is assigned an office, the duty attendant on which he is enjoined to fulfil. On not executing that office he is liable to be impeached. He is to receive compensation for his services. He is elected by the people to execute, not his own business, but that of the public. Can it be denied then that he is a public servant? "Filling the honorable station of servant to the same sovereign people." It is impossible to be more correct in respect to the official situation of the President. With respect to the objection on account of the equality which Mr. Randolph had assumed with the President, how is that improper in the light it is there represented? There is, to be sure, much more confidence vested in the President than in any one member of this House; his share of power is much greater, but he certainly is a public servant as well as Mr. Randolph. There may be different degrees among public officers, and this Mr. Randolph conceived when he made the appeal, but that the Legislator and the President are both servants of the people is a correct idea.

The next part of the letter objected to is the introductory part, which the member considers does not require the preface of apology. The meaning of this part has been tortured by the gentleman from Massachusetts to be that Mr. Randolph disclaimed all expectation of public offices, since his opinions were not of a favorite kind, and therefore it was said not to be decorous.

Mr. OTIS.—I said that the meaning was equivocal, and that it might be susceptible of that construction.

Mr. GALLATIN.—Suppose it is susceptible of that meaning, ought we to blame the gentleman for using the word merely because two or more meanings are attached to it, and on that account a forced construction is put upon it? The meaning is perfectly obvious; that if the application was of such a nature as to require apology, he would make it, but he did not think it necessary as it was not: it appears to be only an excuse for not making an apology; for the same reason he says he shall not use the circumlocution of compliment.

Again. The word "demand" was twisted by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEE) to include the idea that Mr. Randolph suspected the President would not do his duty. Surely this is a tortured meaning. The sense in which it was used is no more than this: "I ask it as a matter of right, and not of favor." I will not, however, say of the word "demand," as I have said of the other part, that it was highly proper. I consider it so harsh that it would have been more prudent to have used some other word.

The committee have thought proper to say that the gentleman has deviated from the decorum customary in official communications. I would then ask, said Mr. G., to what part of the letter these remarks of the committee apply? If it is to the style generally, I would next ask how are we to address ourselves to the President? If a letter to the President is to be called official communication, and by the same rule, if a letter to any other department of the Government is to be called official communication, and in this a certain style is to be observed, then I think we ought to pass a law or resolution to fix a standard of address.

The next objection is to the word "fellow-citizen;" this is substituted in the place of what is frequently used, "most humble and obedient servant." I always subscribe my letters in the latter mode, but that does not appear to be an usual mode with the gentleman; he most likely thinks the other best, because he commonly uses it. Indeed if that gentleman were to address the President in these words, it might not be a correct mode, because he might not be his most humble nor most obedient servant. Indeed we well know that these words are merely complimentary, and no kind of consequence is attached to them. As I do not feel myself possessed of sufficient courage to support the character of a reformer of received customs, I shall not, when they are only absurd, but harmless, pretend to deviate from them, and I do not mean to change my manner in order to assume that used by the gentleman; but he certainly has a right to do it if he thinks proper.

The committee report that the appeal to the Executive is a derogation from the rights of the House. This, said Mr. G., I consider as one of the most heavy charges they could possibly have brought on a member of the House, and on the most slight, not to say absurd, foundation that could have entered their imaginations. We are told, on the one hand, that the officers, whose conduct was complained of, have been guilty of no breach of privilege, and at the same moment that Mr. Randolph has been guilty of a breach of privilege, because he did not call on the House to punish those officers for a breach of privilege.

On what ground does this declaration rest? It is on the principle that the privileges of the House are only cognizable here, and here he ought to have appealed. The position is not correct. It does not follow that because this House had a right to punish a breach of its privileges, the Executive had no right to punish officers under him who were guilty of misconduct. If that did follow, the doctrine would be established that it would be criminal for a member of this House to appeal to any other tribunal for redress than to the House. It would be censurable to appeal to a court of law upon the same principle, and at the same time no redress is to be had here. How inconsistent! We are told by the committee that the complaint does not amount to a breach of privilege, and yet, a breach of privilege being only cognizable here, the member is censured for not bringing it here. The gentleman himself said that the very reason why he did not bring it before this House was, because he did not consider it of importance enough to agitate the House on a question of a breach of privilege; he considered the President could afford an ample remedy in the command he possessed; but he is to be censured for not magnifying it beyond the real ideas he possessed of the facts.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Suppose the offence had been of an amount that required greater punishment than this House had power to give: it is well known that the power of this House does not extend to imprisonment beyond the period of its sitting—from this view would it not be an evil precedent to say that no other appeal should be made than to the House? Would it not be saying to these military gentlemen “you may insult our members for expressions used during debate, but take care you do it just before the adjournment of the House, and then you may be sure of escaping punishment altogether.”

I think, said Mr. G., every member has a right to take that mode of redress which he may think right, if two modes present themselves. If the gentlemen thought it did not amount to a breach of privilege, he had a right to appeal as for a personal insult. But because the power of the House, being defined, does not extend to give him redress, and because the President as Commander-in-Chief has it in his power to give it, he is to have none, because he is a member of this House. This is the amount of the argument!

I think Mr. Randolph perfectly justified, in every point of view I can discover, in making the appeal where he did. It is such an appeal as I should have made had I been in his situation, because I should not have thought it proper to trouble the House with a subject for which the President could provide a more efficient and easier remedy. It is for these reasons I think the whole report ought to be recommitted, if it is designed to do justice to the gentleman.

But we are told that a recommitment would amount to a censure on the committee. How is that? Surely the House have a right to express an opinion as well as the committee; the House must be the best judges of their opinion; and if a committee report contrarily, the House have a right to recommit, and a committee have no right to be offended. It is no censure. If it be a censure to recommit a report, it must be a much greater censure to reject a resolution reported by a committee, yet there is not so much said about the resolutions, and gentlemen do not appear so tenacious of them, as about the reported opinion. But resolutions and reports were frequently recommitted, without any degree of censure being apprehended therefrom.

The House were told in an early part of the debate that persons of different political opinions would form different conclusions, and in fact, Mr. G. said, the conduct of gentlemen since had evinced the truth of the suggestion. This was considered as a rallying point, and he was sorry to see it. He wished party to have nothing to do with this subject; he wished the proceedings on it to stand on the ground of its own merits. Whether the report was recommitted or not, it would stand on its own ground, and if there was censure to be attached to the committee, it would not be affected by the resolution that might be entered into.

Mr. G. concluded by expressing his regret that the whole of the report, which was now considered by some gentlemen only in the light of an opinion entertained and expressed by the committee, had not openly and fairly been submitted to the House in the form of resolutions, by which a vote might be given on them.

Mr. DANA wished, with much sincerity, to declare his full approbation of the conduct of the gentleman in making the subject one of a public nature; it certainly displayed no small victory over his own momentary feelings, to repress those passions which too frequently preponderate in the mind, when he considered himself insulted, and he considered himself a public character. This, said Mr. D., I consider is due to him, but when I say that he has conducted himself with perfect propriety in taking it up in a public and not in a private capacity, I cannot overlook an error which in my opinion he has committed in the choice of tribunal to which he made the appeal. In appealing to the President of the United States, there can be no doubt but the gentleman did it as the “Legislature,” and that he believed the privileges of the body to which he belonged were attacked in him. The President, considering it cognizable in this House, submitted the subject to its consideration; and it will be recollected that a motion was made to refer it to a Committee of Privileges, but that was withdrawn, on the idea that the powers of a Committee of Privileges would not be extensive enough. It certainly then was very proper for that committee to whom it was referred to notice the style of the letter sent to the President, as well as its subject.

But permit me to say, said Mr. D., that whether the language was elegant, or even grammatical, is not worthy of notice; we are not come here to explain the mere schoolboy sense of words; no man who feels the importance of the seat he holds will contend that the President of the United States or this House ought to descend to the boyish business of discussing mere words. The use of the words “fellow-citizen” and “public servant,” I consider as perfectly immaterial; we all have public services to perform, and all act under the Constitution; we are not the masters. If any gentleman then chooses to say we are servants to the sovereign people, he is at liberty to do it. But this kind of language has nothing to do with the republican, more than any other form of Government, and therefore there is no exclusive merit attached to this plainness of address. The station which Mr. Randolph has assigned to himself, in common with the President, is most undoubtedly an honorable station, and the office which he is called to perform he received from the sovereign, and for the sovereign he is to perform it. In this way the gentleman has thought proper to indulge his fancy, and wherein is his fault?

This kind of style has the exterior affectation of humility, which may be very grateful to the feelings of the gentleman's constituents, but I am not willing to make use of such a style, nor am I ashamed to differ from the gentleman. If there be any degradation attached to a different manner of expression of my ideas and feelings, I must submit myself to the censure of my constituents, for I do not choose to follow him in that pretended humility. Away with this idle stuff, this affectation! I am willing my constituents should hear me declare that my masters they are not, nor are they my servants. No, sir, they are my worthy friends, and my neighbors. I am their agent, appointed to transact their public business for them: we have one common interest, which it is my duty and my advantage to study; in that I will study to please. I respect their opinion, or I would not serve them; and they respect me, and approve of my mode of managing our common interests, or I should be unworthy of their confidence, and I will venture to say I should not enjoy it. But I will mention an instance or two wherein modest and humiliating language has been used, and yet the most imperious arrogance has been displayed in the conduct.

If the records of history are to be credited, it must, I presume, be sufficiently evident to the enlightened members of this House that, in a different portion of the globe, and at a different period from the present, there has been a public officer, elevated by his success in obtaining votes, who was attended by princes and emperors as his pages, and who broke sceptres and trampled upon crowns; an elective officer whose feet were kissed by prostrate kings, and whose ghostly power humbled the Governments of the civilized world, and arrogated the prerogative of dividing the terraqueous globe; an officer who, by his act of interdiction, exiled the customary offices of civility and humanity, who rescinded political engagements, armed people against their magistrates, dissolved the civil order, and who, notwithstanding all this, professed to be totally unambitious, and to act solely in obedience to the voice of official duty. The rescript which announced the imperious pretensions of office, was attested under the plain seal of the fisherman's ring. Anathemas, which were intended to convulse empires, were fulminated from the Vatican by a person who assumed the humble appellation of servant of servants.

Although this gentleman's extreme humility led him to consider himself a servant of the sovereign people, yet, it is observable, he makes application to the President in the name of his fellow-servants, or of his masters, the people. It is in their name "he orders the execution of his desire;" he certainly assumes a consequence little worthy of that professed humility. Indeed there is a general strain of imperiousness running through the whole of the appeal, which no analysis can destroy, although the most ingenious attempts have been made.

But, said Mr. D., the gentleman has not addressed the President in a style of request, nor in language which the necessity of the case impelled him to, but in a manner which merits attention, and the conclusion of the letter particularly so: "In addressing you in the plain language of man, I give you, sir, the best proof that I can afford, of the estimation in which I hold your office and your understanding." To make every possible apology for the different idioms of the English language, every gentleman must know that this is not an usual nor a respectful manner of address. It is well known that the President is too well acquainted with the powers of the English language to mistake the meaning of plain words. It is not usual to tell the President, in our communications with him, that we respect his office and his understanding. The construction is sufficiently obvious. But if there was a doubt of the President's failure in his duty, the gentleman ought to have spoken plainly, and not have thrown out insinuations, implying doubts. If I thought he could not or would not act with integrity, I would go further, and make the charge to this House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced a reason for the application to the President in preference to this House, because this House are not able to inflict all the punishment which may be necessary for a breach of privilege.

Wherein is the power of this House defined or limited in this particular? If it be defined at all, it is by parliamentary usage, and by principles of common law. I admit, with that gentleman, that our power is limited to imprisonment during the session. But is this a reason why we are not to judge of the extent of a violation of our privileges, and the punishment that violation merits? Can any other body of men judge what affects our privileges, and to what extent? If it is the privilege of the members of this House to debate freely, who can judge but them how far that privilege is attacked? If the gentleman will consult Parliamentary history he will find that a Legislative body might inflict a punishment to any extent a crime of this sort might deserve; if the imprisonment during the session is too short, by application to the proper officer, the punishment can be extended to any length the crime merits. If the privileges are infringed by officers of the army, it is the business of the House alone to judge how far the punishment shall be inflicted; and if the House should not otherwise carry it so far as the crime merited, it could be completely carried into effect by applying to the commanding officer.

I, therefore, consider this House perfectly competent to afford an ample remedy, and the only proper tribunal to which an appeal is to be made for justice; and I consider, also, that any member of this House making application, on the score of privilege, to any other authority, is at once yielding the first principles of the privileges of the Legislature, and himself making inroads upon the rights of the House.

As it respects the decorum necessary to be observed towards the members of this House, whenever we undertake to judge on this subject, our conduct ought to be measured by the circumstances. If the freedom of debate is among the most precious privileges of the Legislative body, and ought to be preserved inviolate, I am sure gentlemen will also acknowledge, with me, that the dearest privilege of a military man is his honor. Admitting, then, that these officers did repeat the words referred to in the testimony, admit that they repeated them—yet, I contend, that the mere repetition of words is not, nor cannot be, construed to violate our privileges. However harsh the words, if unconnected with menace or assault, it is not breach of privilege.

The fact is, the words which were repeated, were very improper to use in this House; but they were used, and could not avoid mortifying gentlemen in the military line. Sir, if they had not felt the force of the words "mercenary," and "ragamuffin," as used in application to the army, they could not have had American spirit in them; they must have been devoid of every sense of honor, if they had not felt the words when spoken in this House, which ought to be the temple of honor as much as the temple of liberty; but they felt them, and on that occasion they showed their sense of it.

What would our soldiers think if they knew these words were used to reproach them? But the term ragamuffin is incorrect; our soldiers are not clothed in rags, but if they were, it would not detract from their bravery or their usefulness. Let it be remembered, that men clothed in rags have ere now marked the frozen earth with the blood of their footsteps—they have fought heroically—they have conquered. These ragamuffins, though not clothed like members of this House, are yet brave—they are mindful of their country's interest and safety, and therefore they are valuable, instead of meriting reproach and disdain.

The term mercenary was also repeated. If by mercenary is meant menial braves—men who put themselves up to public auction, and are sold to the highest bidder, who regard not the cause they engage in, but make interest their aim, they truly are mercenaries. But if they are so base, where is the honor of the Government who suffer it? Sir, it is not so with our soldiers. 'Tis true they serve their country for pay; but if to receive wages for service means mercenary, the Legislative body is mercenary, the Government itself is mercenary, and the people altogether are a mercenary people. But happily this language could not be properly applied to the army—they are not that contemptible part of society which they are represented to be, and therefore those degrading terms were improper, as they were unnecessary and aggravating.

The use of the words by the member must have affected the feelings of these officers, and no doubt they repeated them that he might hear, and that he might know that they were noticed. But it appears to me, said Mr. D., that they were used more to produce sport than anything else; for, although they might have felt something unpleasant in their first impressions, they well knew that their military honor and that of their comrades could not be shaken by aspersions which they knew were unfounded.

Mr. HARPER said, however he might agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania on some points, he could not accede to every one which he had stated; but in order to bring, with more force, the disagreement to view, he would mention them.

I concur, said Mr. H., that this is not, nor ought to be called a party question. I did hope that a style of language would have been observed that would have entirely excluded the word party from this floor. I think decorum of debate ought to be so far observed as to prevent the word being pronounced. I think every allusion to a party in the country merits a call to order. As to the merits of the question, I declare that I view it as a question between the country and A, and whether A stands on one side of an imaginary line or the other, my declarations will be precisely the same. I disclaim all such paltry motives as any party attachments must evince, and therefore I declare that the rights and honor of the Legislature will be my only aim in discussing the merits of this question.

I concur, also, that the style of the letter was not noticed by the President, and that he felt no insult from it. No, sir, his mind moves in a sphere too exalted; his character is grounded on a basis too broad, for him to feel what in itself was extremely insignificant. The dignity of his mind, his long and respectable standing in this country, raise him far above the danger which any deficiency in the respect of an individual could threaten.

I agree also that the report of the committee does absolutely convey a censure upon the member from Virginia. It is because it does convey a censure that I approve of it; it is because I consider it a strong censure that I shall vote against the recommitment. On what account is this censure reported? Is it because of any boyish style of phraseology, as fellow-citizen, &c.? No, sir, I conceive it is because the committee thought, what I think, that the letter conveys to the President an imperious order. It is upon account of the general tenor of the appeal, implying a command to do—what? To redress an injury? No, sir, but to avenge himself of a supposed affront. In what manner is this affront stated? Is the President told how this was done? No, sir.

Forms of respect, Mr. H. said, were not matters of reasoning, but of sentiment and feeling; he appealed to the impressions this letter, when it was first read, made on every member of the House, whether it was not as he stated it. No member but the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) had approved of the style of the letter; to be sure, he had said he would not have expunged a word from it, had he been consulted, but in this declaration he certainly must have misrepresented his own judgment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had produced an example of some Friends who addressed King James II. in plainness of speech, in order to prove that respect did not consist in expressions. As this example was an extremely happy one to prove the point he wished to maintain, Mr. H. would read it again, and appeal to the good sense of the House to decide whether an address could possibly be couched in terms more perfectly respectful. [He here read the quotation from Hume's England, and in a few comments, hoped the example would have a good effect.]

Another ground of reprehension which has been spoken of, and in which I agree with the committee, is, because the member applied to the Executive—this is essentially derogatory to the honor of the Legislature. Gentlemen here bring into view assault and battery, and ask whether, if it had proceeded so far, he would not have a right to an action in a judicial court? Yes, he would. And in this case he had a right to appeal to the President. But the moment he speaks of privilege, this House, and this alone, has cognizance. Here is the true distinction which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with all his ingenuity, has overlooked. If the gentleman had been assaulted, he might have taken his case before a grand jury, but the question of privilege never could come before a grand jury. In this case, it is not for a breach of law in his person that the gentleman appeals, but for a breach of privilege. His words are, "the independence of the legislator has been infringed." In this application, what could be meant but that the President ought to punish for a breach of privilege? This certainly was the ground of appeal, and, being so plain a fact, it requires no animadversions to prove it derogatory to the rights of this House; and if they cannot prevent a breach of privilege from its own members, it will not be respected by others. I do not believe the gentleman intended to act derogatory to the honor and privilege of this House, but such having been the case, I think it ought to be noticed.

But it is further said in support of the motion to recommit, that the committee had no power to report in the manner they have done, and that they had no power to make remarks on the style of the letter. But I contend that if a letter written by a member of this House is submitted to them, they have a right to report their opinion upon the contents of it. To be silent on it would be the same as to approve of it, and that neither the committee nor the House ought to do, and I trust will not do.

With respect to the words used and conduct of these officers, Mr. H. agreed, that if offensive words were repeated to Mr. Randolph on account of words used in this House, or if offensive words were coupled with offensive actions, in either case it is a breach of privilege. But he denied that any words, offensive in themselves, had been used, or that any act of an offensive nature was perpetrated or conceived.

Mr. H. then explained the nature of a breach of privilege, and called up an example to illustrate his ideas. He then proceeded to a comparison of the testimony of Mr. Christie, with the facts as they appeared from the testimony of other witnesses, and concluded that in the fact respecting the whispering of these officers, and the use of the words "he does not hear you, go nearer to him," he must have misconceived. He recurred to the place in which Mr. Christie's testimony related to the use of the words; to wit, for some time in the adjoining box, till they afterwards came round into the same box. Mr. Macon's and Mr. Glen's testimony on the contrary proved that they came into the same box immediately after they returned from supper, or before the farce began. Thus, however honest, Mr. H. could not but conclude the gentleman was certainly mistaken. This he said was not singular, for such things frequently happened in courts, and yet did not impair the personal respectability of the witness, although it must that part of his evidence.

With respect to the act of sitting down, or if you please, pressing himself by the side of Mr. Randolph, Mr. McKnight could only at most be thought rude. This kind of conduct is well known to be common at the theatre, and frequently done without apology. This might have been done innocently, or it might have been done on purpose to offend, but since the custom is frequent it cannot be noticed as a breach of privilege.

The next act was pulling the coat—an act which, if done in order to offend Mr. Randolph, would have been an act of violence which ought to place the offender at the bar of this House, and if the fact had been proved he ought to have been punished. But when it is considered that the violence of the crowd in going out of the theatre was such as to separate Mr. Taylor from Mr. McKnight, it will cease to appear an offence; but Mr. Taylor was not offended at being caught hold of by the other arm by some strange person, because he knew it might be an effort to prevent falling. Might not the same excuse stand good as to pulling the coat? It appeared to be no other than an effort which the crowd caused, and therefore a mere accident, and as such ought to be excused. Indeed the gentleman had declared that he did the act, but he did it by accident, and very moderately. Shall a man be punished for this act merely, especially since there is no evidence whatever that he did it at all, (for his own confession cannot be admitted.) The fact is, the pulling of the coat, and the other act, is quite out of the question; nothing remains but the simple repetition of certain words made use of by the member in his place.

I do not believe, said Mr. H., that the very same thing would have happened if the gentleman had not been there; but he being there, I also believe that the words were used with a design that he should hear them, but not with a wish to breed a quarrel. This conclusion is established by the facts—there was no quarrel, and had they designed to promote one, it would have occurred. When the coat was pulled, words were used by Mr. Randolph, which, if that event had been designed, would have been taken up for that purpose by Mr. McKnight.

Is this then a breach of privilege? No, sir, it is not. It might have led to a breach of privilege, it is true; opprobrious language and a quarrel might have grown out of it, and then it would have been a breach of privilege, because it was on account of the gentleman's public conduct in the House; but that there was no intention to commit a breach of privilege, and that no such thing was committed, I think too clear to be controverted.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

Mr. SMITH said, that he had intended to take no further part in the present debate. But the manner in which the testimony of his colleague (Mr. Christie) had been treated by the gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. HARPER) induced him to delay the decision for a few minutes. That gentleman calls himself a county-court lawyer; that being such he was in the habit of sifting testimony and examining it with great care—that the custom he had practised in the county courts he should pursue on the present occasion. He then proceeded, in a manner not the most candid, to criticise the positive evidence given by Mr. Christie, which I presume he has learnt in the county courts, but which all will agree ought not to be practised in the Legislature of the United States. Permit me here to observe, that few gentlemen of this House will suffer themselves to be compelled to give testimony in any case pending before the House, if they are to have their positive depositions doubted thus publicly, criticised and rebutted by testimony vague and not decisive, as if they were evidences of bad or doubtful characters, before a county court. The gentleman (Mr. HARPER) ought at least, before he had been thus severe, to have examined the testimony more carefully. I have heard that some gentlemen in the courts are in the habit of bringing forward only such parts of the evidence as best will suit their client—a practice which in this case the gentleman has introduced into the present debate; a practice, however, that I trust will never be countenanced in the case. The gentleman (Mr. H.) says, that Mr. Christie must be mistaken, when, in his deposition, he states, that the transaction “commenced during the play,” and equally so when he says, that “he discovered the officers in an adjoining box;” for that the testimony of all the other witnesses agree that it commenced after the play was over, and that he would prove by the testimony of Mr. Macon and Lieutenant Thompson, that the officers were not at that time in an adjoining box, but in that which Mr. Randolph sat. Mr. Christie does not say that the transaction commenced during the play; of course he has been misstated by the gentleman from South Carolina; misstating may (for aught Mr. S. knew) be a proper practice for county courts, but certainly not very decent in this case for a member of this honorable body.

What has Mr. Christie said? The words in his deposition are, “after the play was over, and about the time the farce was beginning, I discovered, in an adjoining box, Captain McKnight and a gentleman whose name I have since found to be Reynolds, both officers of the navy; I saw also in company with them Mr. George Taylor, of this city; I saw them repeatedly look at our box and whisper to each other.” To prove they were in the adjoining box, the gentleman (Mr.

H.) has rebutted this positive testimony of Mr. Christie with the testimony of Mr. Macon and Lieutenant Thompson. The words read by the gentleman out of Mr. Macon's testimony, do not say whether the officers were or were not in the adjoining box, yet he says Mr. Christie must be mistaken. This, sir, is a strange mode of reasoning, and certainly would be laughed at if used at the bar. Had the gentleman sifted further the testimony of Mr. Macon, he would have seen words rather confirming the testimony of Mr. Christie, but not one contradiction. Lieutenant Thompson, on whose testimony the gentleman (Mr. H.) has placed his chief reliance, says, “Captain McKnight, with several other gentlemen and myself, went to a public house and supped together; on our return to the playhouse, Captain McKnight went into the box where Mr. Randolph was, and remained there during the farce, or was there most of the time.” In this, Lieutenant Thompson does not say that they went into Mr. Randolph's box previous to their having gone into the adjoining box. His testimony, although vague as to that point, has been thought sufficient to refute the positive testimony of Mr. Christie. In another place, Mr. Thompson, answering a query, says: “We were either in the adjoining boxes, or it may be in the same box for a little time.” But, sir, if I prove, by the acknowledgment of the party accused, that Mr. Christie was not mistaken when he said that the officers were “in the adjoining box,” I trust that this House will agree with me that the attack made on my colleague has been without any evidence to support it, and I trust the gentleman (Mr. HARPER) will have the candor to acknowledge to the House the error he has committed, and the politeness to apologise to Mr. Christie for the unmerited censure he has endeavored to fix upon him. Lieutenant Reynolds, one of the officers accused, states that, “during the performance of ‘Blue Beard, there appeared on the stage a number of strange figures, when one of the gentlemen present made use of the expression, that the ragamuffins would make a much better appearance, to which I replied, that could not be doubted; but as to my knowing of Mr. Randolph being in the adjoining box, I did not, until I heard some one behind me mention it.” I trust the House will be of opinion that nothing more will be necessary to confirm the correctness of the testimony of Mr. Christie.

What is the peculiarity or impropriety of style alluded to? Two gentlemen from Massachusetts have declared certain parts of the letter improper; another gentleman (Mr. LEE) has declared those very parts they complained of to be proper. On which of these gentlemen's judgment are we to place most reliance? The fact is, according to our different habits and customs, so will our judgment on a subject like this be guided, and by habits are we led to say what is not an offensive style. As, therefore, there is no acknowledged courtly style known in America, we are not warranted to cast a censure on the gentleman who had used a species of language which to him perhaps is most familiar. The gentlemen from Massachusetts (Messrs. SEWALL and OTIS,) and from Connecticut, (Mr. EDMOND,) say there is no censure included in the words of the report; others say there is. I thought there was, and, therefore, I made the motion of recommitment. What more severe language can be used, sir, than that of the report? It is, in my opinion, the most severe censure that possibly could come from the pen of a committee. Our judgment, even on this point, may differ, according to habit. It is well known that there is a coolness of temper, which is not easily irritated; harsh and severe words will not raise the habitual temper of some men in the world, while in others, nothing can exceed the offence which habit and natural warmth of temper would construe the same words into. I consider these words are offensive, and I confess it appears to me extraordinary that those gentlemen who do not consider them so, and who represent them as quite innocent and unimportant, should appear so very averse to their being stricken out. In my opinion, it would have evinced the candor of gentlemen if they had suffered the report to have been recommitment; it certainly was unfair to introduce a censure by report; had it been done by resolution, we could then have given our opinion, and our vote upon the subject; but the committee having issued their censure by report, we have no means, but by recommitment, to get rid of the offensive matter.

Gentlemen have said that it would be casting a censure on the committee to reconsider the report. If so, how often do we censure different committees of the House? How often are reports recommitment? The practice is common. If the principle is to be adopted, that we must not recommit a report for fear of offending a committee, we may as well make their decision final; upon the same ground we must not alter their resolutions.

I do not mean, said Mr. S., to go into the resolutions; I think they might be modified; upon this subject I would not wish severity. I well recollect that when I was an officer in the army, at the age of the young gentlemen, I should have felt as they did; perhaps I should have done more—my youthful zeal for the honor of the army might have excited me to actions which would have actually brought on a quarrel with the gentleman. I think there can be no doubt, from a review of the whole of this testimony, but the gentlemen accused meant to produce a quarrel; that they did not do it was owing to the moderation of the gentleman.

Gentlemen say mere words are not cause of quarrel! Nothing but violence, in the opinion of those gentlemen, is cause. Sir, I consider words may be worse than blows; words may destroy a man's fame and his honor; blows can be cured, by making the party answer with his life for the offence. We should be careful of countenancing the impetuosity of young officers' tempers, lest we place ourselves in a situation which can little promote the good of the country.

It appears to be the opinion of the committee, that no notice ought to be taken of the conduct of the officers; on the contrary, they actually have attacked the conduct of the gentleman himself, for disrespect to the President. But this is said only to be the opinion of the committee. Sir, the report goes out to the world under the sanction of this House, and in this view it becomes one of its acts. In this view it is casting a Legislative censure on a member! From these views, and because we could not otherwise come at the report, I moved to recommit it; in which I do hope a majority of this House will concur, in order that we may avoid injustice to the gentleman; but without any view of inflicting punishment on the officers.

Mr. SHEPARD.—I wish to ask the House what we are about? I think we are debating on a matter of very little consequence indeed. The question is, whether the report of the select committee shall be recommitment or not. How did this committee come to have the matter before them? It was on account of a few impertinent words which fell from the member from Virginia—a young member, and therefore he certainly was the more excusable. These words struck hard at the young gentlemen of the army. They resented it. I like them all the better for it, Mr. Speaker; they were commendable in showing their resentment at any degrading terms used about the army. Where are we going to end? Gentlemen get up, one after another, repeating the same things over and over, and making no new remarks, no new ideas. Sir, we are only degrading ourselves and lessening the dignity of the House by continuing a debate of so little consequence. It is high time to take the question. Not all that can be said more will alter the mind of a single member; they are already determined how to vote. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen will shorten this debate, and spend their great talents on subjects more honorable to them and to the House. I will then listen to them with the greatest pleasure and patience to the last moment.

Mr. CHRISTIE thought the gentleman from South Carolina, and some other gentlemen, had gone too far in their criticisms on testimony. Mr. C. said he declared only what he knew to be true, but yet it was said he must be mistaken? How mistaken? He only repeated upon oath words which were positively uttered, and in a place about which he could not be mistaken. Every incidental word of that testimony, Mr. C. said, came under his particular observation. But one lawyer had got up and thought him mistaken in one instance, another in another; another might presently get up and question whether he was at the theatre at all or not. Upon my word, said Mr. C., I do not know what these county-court lawyers cannot do, or how far their habits of culling testimony may lead them. Had I known the manner in which my testimony would have been treated, I should have been very unwilling to have obeyed the commands of the House to give it at all; and I believe in future it will be likely to have that effect upon me.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he would call the attention of the House to a single observation.

JANUARY, 1800.

Breach of Privilege.

H. OF R.

The situation, Mr. Speaker, in which I find myself is indeed new to me—standing upon your floor not as a person aggrieved, but in the character of a criminal. And with what, sir, am I charged? With “transferring the authority of this House to the President of the United States, by appealing to that Magistrate, in the name of the Legislature, on an occasion wherein its privileges had been infringed.”

I have “appealed in the name of the Legislature!” Although this opinion has not been advanced by the committee in direct terms, it seems to have gained the assent of many members on this floor. Will those gentlemen who are so ready to suppose me capable of this monstrous absurdity, advert to the error of the press in the printed report, which has substituted that word for legislator? Will they take the trouble of turning to the original letter? They will then discover that I have not assumed to myself the right of acting in the name, not of this House only, but of both branches of Congress, unsupported by the authority of either. They will see that the relative their can have reference only to the antecedent “people,” and that as the representative of their majesty which had been insulted; as clothed with their authority which had been contemned; as the Commander-in-Chief of their forces, did the President become the object of my application.

I have “prostrated the privileges of this House before the shrine of Executive power.” And can any one suppose, Mr. Speaker, that it is my desire to enlarge the Executive authority at the expense of the Legislative; to confide your rights to the unsafe guardianship of the President; and to hold at his will the inestimable privilege of free debate? I am under no apprehension, sir, that a serious belief of such an intention on my part can be entertained by any one who is at all acquainted with my political opinions—opinions hostile to the extension of Executive influence, and which inculcate a well-grounded jealousy of its formidable pretensions. But, sir, in relation to the fact: how does that stand? Will gentlemen carry their recollection back to the period when my letter was submitted by the President to their consideration? Did I not contest your right to extend your privileges beyond those limits which the Constitution had prescribed; did I not express a fear least a dangerous precedent might be established which would lead to terrible abuses—which would be prostituted to the most nefarious purposes; and did I not oppose a reference of the Message, upon the ground that there had been no breach of privilege? The committee agrees with me in this opinion, and it has received the concurrence of the House. Yet that very committee has determined (and you are about to affirm the decree) that I have submitted to the decision of the President a case involving the privileges of the representative body, although they have declared (and although this House has sanctioned the declaration) that no such case has occurred; although it is in evidence to you such was my own impression of the subject. If, Mr. Speaker, my opinion of the case had been that it was a breach of privilege, or if such had been the sentiment of the House, then, indeed, there might have been some ground for crimination. If I had viewed it in this light, where would have been the difficulty of addressing my application to yourself? But it will be remembered, that at the time when the Message was delivered, at the time when I disclaimed the idea of a breach of privilege or of your protection, I made this declaration. But it was in his military capacity that I addressed myself to the President; because I supposed the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief would suggest the necessity of a provision, to which his authority was completely adequate, which would remedy the present instance of misconduct, and repress those of a similar nature in future. Can a representation to the Commander-in-Chief of the misbehaviour of his subalterns, in a case not amounting to a breach of privilege, (for the committee and the House unite with me in this opinion)—can a statement of this outrage, because aggravated by the consideration of the official conduct which excited it, and of the legislative character which was its object—can an application to a military tribunal for remedy, to whose provision this House is not competent, for an offence in which its privileges are not implicated, can such a procedure attract your censure, “as derogating from those rights with which your honor, your independence, and the inviolability of your members, are intimately connected?”

It was my intention, Mr. Speaker, to explain the error into which we should be led by adopting the expression of the printed report, and to recall to the minds of gentlemen a chain of facts which display in a proper light the motives by which I have been actuated. It formed no part of my design to enter into any explanation of the various clauses and expressions of my letter, which have become the object of the very ingenious criticism of many members upon this floor; if, indeed, such had been my intention, I should have been anticipated by the candid illustration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN.) His exposition is warranted both by the literal sense of the composition which has become the object of so much virulent invective, and by that which the author has even affixed to the expressions which he has thought proper to use.

I join with the gentleman from Massachusetts in the wish that the question might be immediately taken. Whatever the success of the motion, so far as relates to myself, it is a matter of indifference to me. It was under no expectation of averting the censure of the House that I have now addressed it. I entertain not a doubt upon the issue. But in the unshaken conviction of the propriety of my procedure, and in the approbation of my constituents, whose honor and whose interests it will ever be my object to maintain, I can have no cause of personal regret.

The question was then taken upon recommitting the report, and was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 50, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 29.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine and report what laws of the United States have expired, or are near expiring, made a further report, in part; which was read and considered. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to continue in force an act entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred, on the thirteenth instant, to prepare and report a bill to continue in force, "An act declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland, and to continue an act declaring the consent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island," reported a bill declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Rhode Island, Maryland, and Georgia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

CASE OF MR. RANDOLPH.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee, to whom was referred, on the fourteenth instant, the Message of the President of the United States, together with a letter of JOHN RANDOLPH, Jr., a member of this House from the State of Virginia: and the same being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"In executing the task assigned to them, it is with peculiar satisfaction your committee notice the respect shown in his Message by the President of the United States, to the rights and privileges of the House.

"On the style of the letter to the President, referred to the consideration of the committee, they forbear any other remark than to express their regret that a member of the House has conceived himself justified in deviating from the forms of decorum customary in official communications to the Chief Magistrate of the United States, justly due to his office and character, and essential to that harmony between the different branches of the Government, which should be circumspectly cherished by their respective members.

"In Mr. Randolph's letter, he states, that for words of a general nature, uttered in debate in the House of Representatives, on the proposition for reducing the Army, he had been publicly and grossly insulted by several persons, officers of the Army or Navy; and demands, of the Executive authority, redress for an attack on his independence and rights as a legislator.

"Your committee, being of opinion that the matter of complaint respects the privileges of the House, inherent in its own body, and there exclusively cognizable, cannot but consider the appeal, in this instance, to the Executive authority, however otherwise intended, as derogating from those rights of the House with which are intimately connected both its honor and independence, and the inviolability of its members.

"Your committee further report that, on inquiry, they found James McKnight, Captain, and Michael Reynolds, Lieutenant, of Marines, to be the persons implicated in Mr. Randolph's charge. They, on notice, appeared before the committee, and denied the truth of the allegations. The committee have collected all the evidence they could find to be material in the case, and heard the parties accused, with their witnesses; and, although they believe a series of circumstances to have taken place at the theatre, on the evening of Friday, the 10th instant, which appeared to Mr. Randolph, and others present, to evince premeditated insult towards him, yet, as some of those circumstances have been satisfactorily explained, and others are of a nature too equivocal to justify reprehension and punishment, your committee are of opinion that sufficient cause does not appear for the interference of the House, on the ground of a breach of their privileges.

"Your committee have taken the evidence in writing, which they submit to the consideration of the House, with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House entertain a respectful sense of the regard which the President of the United States has shown to its rights and privileges, in his Message of the 14th instant, accompanied by a letter addressed to him by John Randolph, jun., a member of this House.

Resolved, That in respect to the charge alleged by John Randolph, jun., a member of this House, in his letter addressed to the President of the United States, on the 11th instant, and by him submitted to the consideration of the House, that sufficient cause does not appear for the interposition of this House, on the ground of a breach of its privileges."

The question was taken, that the House do agree to the first resolution contained in the said report, and resolved in the affirmative.

The second resolution being under consideration, a motion was made and seconded to amend the same by inserting, before the word "sufficient," in the fifth line, the words "although the conduct of Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds was indiscreet and improper, yet," and to insert, before the word "interposition," in the sixth line, the word "further." Whereupon,

It was further moved and seconded to amend the said amendment, by inserting, after the word "improper," the words "and deserves reprehension."

And the question being taken, that the House do agree to the same, it passed in the negative—yeas 42, nays 56, as follows:

A motion was then made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That this House do highly disapprove of the conduct of Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds, towards John Randolph, a member of this House, on the evening of Friday, the tenth instant; but, considering it as an indiscretion of youth, are unwilling to exercise their constitutional authority of punishment, under a hope that similar instances of misconduct will not occur in future.

The SPEAKER deciding the said motion not to be in order, an appeal was made to the House from the decision of the Chair; and the question being taken that the House do concur with the SPEAKER in his said decision, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 56, nays 42, as follows:

titled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose," as restricts the right of obtaining patents for useful discoveries and inventions, to the citizens of the United States, and for extending the said right to all persons who shall have resided within the said States for a limited time; and to the executors and administrators of the inventors of useful arts and inventions, who may have died before a patent has issued for such invention.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON laid the following resolutions on the table:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for carrying into effect the twenty-seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and the King of Great Britain.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House copies of the requisition for, and other papers relative to, the apprehension and delivering of Jonathan Robbins, under the twenty-seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and the King of Great Britain, together with copies of the communications (if any) between either of the Executive Departments and the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, on the subject.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, at the time the law was passed respecting the British Treaty, provision was supposed to have been made for carrying it fully into execution. The twenty-seventh article, however, of that Treaty, had been found unjust, impolitic, and cruel. He then read the article, by a recent construction of which, Mr. L. said, a citizen of the United States might be dragged from his country, his connexions, and his friends, and subjected to the judgment of an unrelenting military tribunal.

The second resolution, Mr. L. said, was connected with the first, although addressed to the Chief Magistrate of the Union. It had been said, and repeated in every paper throughout the United States, that a letter had been written by an Executive officer advising a Judge, in his judicial capacity, of the line of conduct which it was wished by the Executive should be pursued. He did not know this to be the fact, and would be happy to find it was not; nor did he mean now to enter into any discussion on the subject; and concluded with laying the resolutions on the table.

Ordered, That Mr. DANA, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. BAYARD, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the resolutions, and that the said committee have power to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. CLAIBORNE be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States with the last resolution.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

An engrossed bill for the relief of James Yard was read the third time and passed.

A petition of John Wilkins, Jr., and others, was presented to the House and read, praying that a resurvey of certain lands purchased by the petitioners from the United States, may be granted, in consequence of a deficiency which appears upon actual admeasurement to exist; and that the amount of such deficiency may be deducted from the payment of the last moiety of the purchase-money.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed on the twenty-fourth of December last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the Ohio.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed yesterday, to wait on the President of the United States with a resolution requesting, him "to lay before this House copies of the requisition for, and other papers relative to, the apprehension and delivery of Jonathan Robbins, under the twenty-seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and the King of Great Britain, together with copies of the communications, if any, between either of the Executive Departments and the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, on the subject," reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President had signified to them, that he would take the request of the said resolution into consideration, and return an answer in due season.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendment disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal part of an act, entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned,'" and doth agree to the amendments proposed by this House to the other amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying two statements in relation to the internal revenues of the United States, made in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the 6th

NORTHWESTERN LANDS.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory, residing on lands purchased from John Cleves Symmes, was presented to the House and read, praying that the said Symmes may be allowed to complete his contract with the United States, or that such other relief may be granted to the petitioners as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth of December last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the laws authorizing the sale of the lands of the United States, Northwest of the Ohio.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The following Message and documents were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In consequence of your request to me, conveyed in your resolution of the fourth of this month, I directed the Secretary of State to lay before me copies of the papers intended. These copies, together with his report, I now transmit to the House of Representatives, for the consideration of the members.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, Feb. 7, 1800.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
February 6, 1800.

The Secretary of State has prepared, as directed, and now respectfully submits to the President of the United States, copies of the papers which probably were contemplated by the House of Representatives, in their resolve of the 4th instant; although no requisition, as the resolve supposes, has ever been received, nor any communication made to the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, concerning any man by the name of Jonathan Robbins. But by the proceedings before that Judge, as they have been published, it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, the subject of the British Minister's requisition, did assume the name of Jonathan Robbins, and make oath "that he was a native of the State of Connecticut, and born in Danbury, in that State." The Secretary therefore, besides the copy of the requisition, and the copies of his letter to the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, and of the Judge's answer, has prepared, and herewith encloses, copies of the certificates of the selectmen and town clerk of Danbury, and extracts of letters from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, satisfactorily proving that the Thomas Nash, calling himself Jonathan Robbins, who, on the requisition of the British Minister, was delivered by the Judge aforesaid, with the assent of the President of the United States, was not an American citizen, but a native Irishman, who to his other crimes added perjury, in the hope, thereby, to escape the punishment due to piracy and murder. The original certificates of the selectmen and town clerk of Danbury are in the Secretary's possession; and he has compared the extract of Admiral Parker's letter to Mr. Liston with the original, and the extract of the Admiral's letter to the British Consul at Charleston, with the passage as recited in the Consul's original letter to Mr. Liston.

All which is respectfully submitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Copy of a note from Robert Liston, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, to Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, May 23, 1799.

R. Liston presents his respects to Col. Pickering, Secretary of State. A seaman of the name of Thomas Nash having been committed to jail in Charleston, South Carolina, at the instance of His Majesty's Consul there, on suspicion of his having been an accomplice in the piracy and murder committed on board His Majesty's ship Hermione, and information of the circumstance having been transmitted to Vice Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, a cutter was despatched to Charleston, with an officer on board to whom the man was well known, in order that his person might be indentified, and that he should be carried to the West Indies for trial. But on the application of the Consul for the restoration of Nash, in conformity to the treaty of 1794, Judge Bee and the Federal Attorney were of opinion that he could not with propriety be delivered up, without a previous requisition on my part made to the Executive Government of the United States. May I therefore request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this matter before the President, and procure his orders that the said Thomas Nash be delivered up to justice.

Letter from the Secretary of State, to Judge Bee.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Philadelphia, June 3, 1799.

SIR: Mr. Liston, the Minister of His Britannic Majesty has requested, that Thomas Nash, who was a seaman on board the British frigate Hermione, and who he is informed is now a prisoner in the jail of Charleston, should be delivered up. I have stated the matter to the President of the United States. He considers an offence committed on board a public ship of war, on the high seas, to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs. Nash is charged, it is understood, with piracy and murder, committed by him on board the above mentioned British frigate, on the high seas, and consequently within the jurisdiction of His Britannic Majesty; and therefore, by the 27th article of the Treaty of Amity with Great Britain, Nash ought to be delivered up, as requested by the British Minister, provided such evidence of his criminality be produced as, by the laws of the United States or of South Carolina, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. The President has in consequence thereof authorized me to communicate to you "his advice and request" that Thomas Nash, may be delivered up to the Consul or other agent of Great Britain, who shall appear to receive him. I have the honor be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

HON. THOMAS BEE,
Judge of the District of South Carolina.

Letter from Thomas Bee, Esq., to the Secretary of State, dated Charleston, South Carolina, July 1st, 1799.

In compliance with the request of the President of the United States as stated in your favor of the 3d ult., I gave notice to the British Consul that at the sitting of the district court on this day I should order Thomas Nash, the prisoner charged with having committed murder and piracy on board the British frigate Hermione on such strong evidence of his criminality as justified his apprehension and commitment for trial, to be brought before me on habeas corpus, in order to his being delivered over agreeably to the 27th article of the Treaty of Amity with Great Britain. The Consul attended in court and requested that the prisoner should remain in jail until he had a convenient opportunity of sending him away. I have therefore directed that he remain in prison, until the Consul shall find it convenient to remove him. I have the honor to be with great respect your most obedient servant,

THOMAS BEE.

MAJOR TAYLOR.

Extract of a letter from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, to Robert Liston, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty to the United States, dated

PORT ROYAL HARBOR,
Jamaica, Sept. 9, 1799.

"I have had the honor of receiving duplicates of your Excellency's letters, numbered 10, 11, and 12, and, in answer thereto, acquaint you that in consequence of Nash, one of the ringleaders in the mutiny, murders, &c., on board the Hermione, being delivered up by the United States to me, he has been tried at a court martial, and sentenced to suffer death, and afterwards hung in chains, which sentence has been put into execution. He acknowledged himself to be an Irishman."

Extract of a letter from Benjamin Moodie, Esq., Consul of His Britannic Majesty at Charleston, South Carolina, to Robert Liston, Esq., Envoy of his said Majesty to the United States, dated NOVEMBER, 19, 1799.

In consequence of many obstacles I had to encounter in obtaining the delivery of Thomas Nash, late of His Majesty's ship Hermione, and of the numerous publications to the northward and in this place, I wrote to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, requesting he would be good enough to send me minutes of the court martial, to which he answered under date 13th September: "I am to acquaint you that Nash has been executed agreeably to a court martial, and that he confessed himself to be an Irishman; and it further appears, by the Hermione's books, that he was born at Waterford; on the 21st December, 1792, entered a volunteer on board the Dover, received £3 bounty money, and was removed to the Hermione, 28th of January, 1793. And with respect to transmitting the minutes of his trial, that is not in my power, but rests with the Lords of the Admiralty only."

MONDAY, February 10.

Mr. ABIEL FOSTER laid the following resolution on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alteration is necessary to be made in the compensation of the officers of this House and of the Senate.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, one containing a statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and the other a statement of the duties and drawbacks on merchandise.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called up a resolution he laid on the table on Friday, and substituted the following in its place:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the acts making provision for the establishment of trading houses with the Indian tribes; and also into the expediency of reviving and continuing in force the said acts.

MESSRS. CLAIBORNE, NICHOLAS, HENDERSON, THATCHER, and ELIZUR GOODRICH, were appointed.

The petition of Amy Dardin was called up, and after some opposition, on account of a former reference and decision, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion for an adjournment of both Houses on the first Monday in April next was taken up. Mr. KITTERA moved to insert the first day instead of the first Monday in April. Mr. MACON moved to change it to the third Monday in March. Both these motions were negatived, and the original one carried—ayes 55.

CREDIT ON DUTY BONDS.

Mr. SMITH, Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures reported a resolution, which he said the present deranged state of commerce rendered necessary and very important to the commercial interests; he therefore hoped it would be passed without delay.

On motion the House resolved itself into a Committee thereupon, and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the term of payment allowed by law on bonds which have been given, and which shall become due prior to the first day of August next, for duties on import, may be extended for sixty days, in all cases, respectively, where it shall be required by the parties, and where the recovery of such imposts shall not be endangered thereby. Provided, That in every case of such additional credit, there shall be required and paid on such bonds, respectively, interest at the rate of one half per cent per month from the time such duties shall be respectively due and payable according to law.

It was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to report a bill accordingly.

CAVEATS AGAINST LAND PATENTS.

Mr. DAVIS laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of passing a law to regulate the manner of entering caveats to prevent the issuing of patents for land granted for military services; and that the same committee be directed to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of passing a law to prevent the entering a caveat in any case to hinder the issuing a patent for land granted for military services.

TUESDAY, February 11.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, pursuant to the order of the House of yesterday, reported a bill extending the time for the payment of bonds given for duties of impost, in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Mr. GORDON, from the select committee to whom were referred the consideration of that part of the law relative to the Military Establishment which provides that non-commissioned officers or privates shall not be arrested for debt, reported a bill "in addition to the laws relative to the Military Establishment of the United States;" which was read a first and second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for salvage in case of recapture, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday.

A petition of Samuel Lewis, senior, late a Clerk in the War Office, stated that, upon a settlement of his account with the United States, a balance has been found due from him to the United States, for which he is now imprisoned; that he is unable to discharge the same; and praying that he may be liberated from his confinement.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented, a bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws establishing a post office and post roads within the United States, have leave to report by bill or bills, or otherwise.

UNIFORM BANKRUPTCY.

The order of the day to take into consideration the report of the Committee of the whole House on the Bankrupt bill, having been called for by Mr. BAYARD—after proposing and agreeing to several amendments,

Mr. JONES, agreeably to the notice which he had given, moved the following additional section:

"And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained, shall extend to, or in any wise affect or operate upon debts contracted, or transactions which may have taken place, prior to the passing thereof."

This motion was opposed by Messrs. BAYARD and MARSHALL, and finally negatived, only 24 members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the 24th section, which gives the commissioners power to examine the wife of a bankrupt upon oath—which created considerable debate. Upon the question there were yeas 38, nays 49.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next—55 members voting in favor of it.

DRAWBACK OF DUTY.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the memorial of a number of merchants of the city of Philadelphia, relative to the 75th section of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, reported a bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

WEDNESDAY, February 12.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill extending the time of payment of bonds given for duties of imposts, in certain cases, when

Mr. SHEAFE having suggested, that the giving this indulgence might inconvenience the Treasury, by being called upon by the collectors for money to discharge debentures on goods given for drawback, without a positive provision be made that such debentures should not be paid until the duties were discharged, after some observations from Messrs. SMITH, NICHOLAS, OTIS, and SEWALL, the Committee rose and the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France and the dependencies thereof; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. DAVIS called up for consideration the resolution which he laid on the table on Monday last, instituting an inquiry into the expediency of preventing caveats being filed against the issuing of patents for land granted by the State of Virginia, for military services; and the resolution having been again read, was agreed to, and a committee of three members appointed for the purpose.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the ninth of December last, so much of the President's Speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country," laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the said committee, relative to the establishment of military schools; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ARRESTING SOLDIERS FOR DEBT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to the laws relative to the Military Establishment of the United States, Mr. RUTLEDGE in the Chair; when the bill was read, as follows.

Be it enacted &c., That if any person who shall have enlisted, or hereafter may enlist, as a non-commissioned officer or private soldier, in the service of the United States, shall, prior to his enlistment, have been taken in execution, or arrested for debt, or contract, and committed to prison, and at the time of his enlistment as aforesaid, be holden in prison by virtue of said execution or arrest, such person shall not be discharged from his imprisonment in consequence of his enlisting as aforesaid; and in case any such person, arrested as aforesaid, and prior to his enlistment, shall have given bail, and at the time of his enlistment his bail shall not be discharged in due course of law, it shall and may be lawful for the bail to take such measures for his or their discharge, as he or they might have taken if the principal had not been enlisted in the service of the United States; and in case the principal shall be surrendered up by the bail, he shall be holden in like manner, as if he had not been enlisted as aforesaid; any law or laws to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. OTIS moved to amend the bill so as to confine its operation to persons who may hereafter enlist, by striking out the words in italic in the second line of it.

Mr. O. said he conceived the Government had no right to break their contract with the soldiers, a great part of whom had probably enlisted for the benefit of the provision now about to be rescinded.

After some debate, and Mr. NICHOLAS having said he wished to make a motion which would more fully try this principle, Mr. OTIS withdrew his motion, and the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment—when

Mr. NICHOLAS moved that the bill be recommended to a select committee, with instruction to amend the laws relative to the Military Establishment, so as to take away the exemption thereby given to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, from arrest for any debt or contract, existing or entered into before their enlistment, above the sum of twenty dollars.

MESSRS. MARSHALL, OTIS, RUTLEDGE, SMITH, SHEPARD, and CHAMPLIN, opposed the motion; and MESSRS. VARNUM, MACON, NICHOLAS, JONES, and GALLATIN, spoke in favor of it. The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 51 as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Theodorus Bailey, Phaneul Bishop, Robert Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Matthew Clay, William C. C. Claiborne, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, Joseph Eggleston, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, Albert Gallatin, Samuel Goode, Andrew Gregg, John A. Hanna, Joseph Heister, Archibald Henderson, David Holmes, George Jackson, James Jones, Aaron Kitchell, Michael Leib, Matthew Lyon, Edward Livingston, Nathaniel

And then the question being taken that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 33, nays 53; and so the bill was rejected.

THURSDAY, February 13.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. LEIB called up for consideration the following resolution, which he laid on the table on the 4th instant, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill making provision for the removal of the regular troops of the United States which may be stationed where an election is held, and that such removal shall take place at least two days previous to such election, and to a distance not less than two miles.

Mr. OTIS moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words in italic, in the second line, and inserting "inquire into the expediency of."

A long debate ensued on this motion, in which it was conceded, on all sides, that the resolution was too definite, and left nothing in the power of the committee to act on, except merely bringing in a bill conformable to it. If excesses had been committed by the military at elections, and they were guilty of improper interference, it seemed to be the wish of every member that some provision should be made to guard against them in future; but they were unwilling to say what that provision should be until an inquiry were made into the facts stated. The removal of the troops to the distance mentioned, was also particularly objected to, as it might leave fortifications, arsenals, and military stores, for two or three days, entirely unprotected.

Mr. LEIB at length withdrew his original proposition, and submitted the following, which was adopted without objection, viz:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill, containing such legislative provisions as may be judged expedient, either for removing any military force of the United States, from any place of holding elections, or for preventing their interference in such elections."

Mr. MASHALL, Mr. LEIB and Mr. OTIS, were appointed the committee.

UNIFORM MILITIA.

Mr. H. LEE, from the select committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States; which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday.

CREDIT ON DUTY BONDS.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was recommitted "a bill to extend the time of payment of bonds given for duties of impost, in certain cases," reported the same, with amendments.

The bill was read a first and second time, and committed for to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LIVINGSTON laid the following joint resolution on the table:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

No Judge of any Court of the United States shall, during his continuance in office, or within six months after he may have resigned the same, be appointed to any other than a judiciary office, under the United States.

STRANGERS ON THE FLOOR.

Mr. DANA said, he wished some other regulation to be made, relative to the exclusion of strangers from the floor of the House, within the bar, and to this effect proposed an order that the Doorkeeper be authorized to admit strangers, on their presenting a card signed by one of the members, which card should mention the name of the bearer, and bear date on the day of admission; no member to have liberty to give more than one card in one day.

Mr. MACON did not approve of this regulation, nor was he a friend to the one lately adopted. He thought very little inconvenience was experienced before the recent regulation took place, and wished it to be rescinded.

The motion was ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, February 14.

Mr. HANNA presented a petition of a number of the inhabitants of the Northwest Territory, praying a confirmation of their titles to certain lands purchased from John Cleves Symmes. Referred to the committee appointed on the subject of public lands.

Mr. A. FOSTER called up for consideration the resolution which he laid on the table, for appointing a committee to inquire whether any alterations ought to be made in the compensation allowed to the officers of the two Houses of Congress; which was agreed to, and three members appointed.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed to inquire into the operation of the existing law suspending the intercourse with France, made a report, which was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse with France.

[The committee state it to be their opinion, that the law had been faithfully executed by the officers of Government, but that the principles of it had been evaded by individuals acting from interested motives, and contains a variety of information in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the committee, propounding several questions relative to the existing law, and suggesting strong measures to prevent frauds in future.]

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the laws enacted for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio.

The Message and the papers accompanying it were referred to the select committee to whom were referred the petition and remonstrances of sundry inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to amend the following part of the first section, to wit: "and if any ship or vessel owned, hired, or employed by any person or persons resident within the United States, shall directly or indirectly proceed to a French port," &c., by striking out the words in italic, and inserting "citizen or citizens of," thereby giving neutrals resident within the United States, or elsewhere, the liberty of trading from the ports of the United States to those of France in neutral bottoms.

Mr. SEWALL conceived the amendment would render the bill intolerable to the citizens of the United States, who would view with a jealous eye foreigners among them enjoying the benefits of a trade they were precluded from, and employing our own vessels and sailors for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH said, the original law, now in existence, was intended to embrace two objects: first, the cutting off all provisions and supplies from the West India islands; second, and the main object, preventing our property from entering the ports of France and being seized and confiscated, an open rupture being at that time considered as unavoidable. And both these measures were also intended to coerce the French Government to an accommodation. But these objects had failed, and their policy, instead of benefiting, had injured, this country. He was, therefore, in favor of the amendment.

What, said Mr. S., will be the operation of this amendment? Gentlemen were mistaken when they supposed our own vessels or our own sailors would be employed to carry on this trade. Neutral vessels could be employed. If a single American sailor were found on the list of the role d'équipage, the whole property would be liable to condemnation, if taken by a French cruiser. And they were also mistaken if they supposed any protection would be required from the American Government. What would be its operation on our commerce? Are we not now restricted from carrying our property, and shall we not be restricted by the bill upon the table? And how, then, shall we suffer by adopting the amendment? It had been said we might carry on an intermediate trade. It was true this had and might still be done, but the inconveniences and the risks were incalculable.

FEBRUARY, 1800.

Case of Jonathan Robbins, &c.

H. OF R.

And what, exclaimed Mr. S., would be its operation on our agricultural interests? An immediate advantageous sale for our produce would be offered, which now lies rotting in our warehouses. Double risks and double insurances would be saved by purchasers coming into our market and giving a fair price for our commodities.

If we were in actual war, said Mr. S., would it not be good policy to permit neutrals to purchase our produce, and thereby enable us to carry on that war; to support that navy which was raised for our protection; to enable the citizens to pay the additional burdens which our exigencies require; and, finally, prevent the sinking of our revenue, as was the case the last year? It was this policy which enabled Great Britain to meet her extraordinary demands; it was this policy which we ought to pursue, and which he hoped the citizens of the United States would not be deprived the benefit of.

A long debate ensued on Mr. NICHOLAS'S amendment, and the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again, without taking the question upon it.

Mr. KITTERA said, he perceived a disposition to travel over the whole of the arguments which had been formerly used relative to the expediency of suspending the intercourse with France; and as some delay must ensue thereby, and as it was important for the citizens of the United States to know whether the prohibition would be continued, he would move the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report a bill to continue in force for one month the act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof."

Ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 17.

The SPEAKER read a letter from the Commissioners appointed to settle and adjust the claims of Canada and Nova Scotia Refugees, enclosing a statement of their proceedings under the act authorizing their appointment.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the time of payment of bonds given for duties of impost, in certain cases, and reported their agreement to the same. It was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. DANA called up for consideration the order which he proposed to be made relative to the admission of strangers by a card given by a member, and, after some debate, it was negatived—yeas 30, nays 41.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of the Corporation of Rhode Island College, recommending an agreement, on the part of the House, to a resolution heretofore reported on that subject, the purport of which is, that the accounting officers of the Treasury should liquidate and settle the claims for compensation for the use and occupation of the College edifice, and for injuries done to the same, by the troops of the United States.

The report was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said, he had expected that some order would have been taken on the Message of the President, before this time, by the gentleman who called for it; but as he had been disappointed, he would now give notice to the honorable member from New York that he would call for some order upon the Message to-morrow.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, the gentleman had momentarily anticipated him; he meant to have moved for a reference to a Committee of the whole House this morning, with an intention to introduce certain resolutions, and he would now make that motion.

The question on commitment was put and carried—yeas 50, nays 43; and was made the order of the day for Friday.

Mr. BAYARD then laid the following resolution on the table, which was read and referred to the above Committee, viz:

Resolved, That the conduct of the Executive Government of the United States, in relation to the requisition made by His Britannic Majesty's Minister, of the delivery up to justice of Thomas Nash, otherwise called Jonathan Robbins, upon the charge of murder, committed on board of the Hermion British frigate, which said Nash had sought an asylum within the United States, was conformable to the duty of the Government, and to the obligations of good faith stipulated in the 27th article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, made with Great Britain.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France; and,

Mr. NICHOLAS'S amendment being under consideration, Messrs. OTIS, RUTLEDGE, and H. LEE, spoke against it; and Messrs. NICHOLAS, MACON, and RANDOLPH, in favor of it.

Mr. KITTERA then moved that the Committee rise, for the purpose of taking into consideration the resolution which he laid on the table on Friday, proposing to continue in force the existing law, which will expire on the second day of March next, till the second day of April next.

This motion was negatived—yeas 37, nays 44—on the ground that the bill under consideration would be likely to pass as soon as the one which the gentleman contemplated.

Messrs. MARSHALL and WALN then spoke against it, and Messrs. SMITH, RANDOLPH, NICHOLAS, JONES, and CLAY, in favor of it; when the question on the amendment was taken and negatived—yeas 42, nays 51.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 18.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to extend the time of payment of bonds given for duties of impost, in certain cases," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SMITH reported a bill from the Committee of Commerce for the relief of Thomas Arnold; which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

Mr. MARSHALL, chairman of the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a "bill for removing any military force of the United States from the places of holding elections;" which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

Mr. HARRISON, chairman of the committee appointed on the 24th December last to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations may be necessary in the laws relating to the sale of lands in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, made a report, in part, of several resolutions; which were referred to the Committee of the whole House.

CONNECTICUT WESTERN RESERVE.

Mr. BRACE, on account of a bill which passed the Senate last session, and which was sent down to the House just before the rising of Congress, and therefore was not taken up, laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of accepting from the State of Connecticut a cession of jurisdiction, in the State of Pennsylvania, commonly called the Western Reserve of Connecticut, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. C. CLAIBORNE made a report in part, from the committee appointed on the 18th ultimo to take into consideration the petitions of Cato West and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory. The committee reported some resolutions, one of which was that the same regulations and privileges be extended to the inhabitants of that Territory as were to the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, under an ordinance for their government, &c., proportionate to their numbers, which at present are not accurately ascertained.

This report was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the French Intercourse Bill.

Mr. WALN moved an amendment to the bill, so that persons resident in Europe only, who owned, hired, or employed foreign vessels, should obtain a clearance to any port of the French Republic or its dependencies. His wish was to prevent its being done by persons resident in the West Indies or elsewhere, except in Europe.

This motion caused some debate. Mr. HARPER at length superseded that motion by one to strike out part of the section, so as to prevent the intercourse being carried on by neutrals, in any manner whatever. This, he said, was truly consistent with the spirit of the act, which was to suspend the intercourse altogether.

Some debate ensued on this motion, which was at length negatived—48 to 41.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out of the third section the words "in bills of exchange, or in money, or bullion," so that vessels which should be driven into a French port by distress of weather, or other casualty, might receive compensation for their cargo, produce, or merchandise.

Mr. CHAMPLIN opposed this motion. He said difficulties had occurred for want of this provision in the old law; it was now introduced to prevent any encouragement offering itself to the merchant who would wish to evade the law under the pretence of distress of weather; for if he could not take a cargo in return, it would not turn to his advantage to enter a French port under this pretence.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the whole of the sixth section, but afterwards so modified the section as that the President should not have power to take off the restriction of the act partially, or, in regard to ports with which he might deem it expedient to open the communication. He had no objection for the power to exist in the President to renew the intercourse when events should warrant it, but he wished it to be wholly done, or not at all.

This was also negatived.

Mr. GALLATIN wished to know the meaning of the beginning of the seventh section which is in these words:

"That the whole island of Hispaniola shall, for the purpose of this act, be considered as a dependency of the French Republic."

He understood a part of it, which, by the treaty with Spain, was ceded to France, had not been evacuated by Spain. The Government and laws, as well as the people of that nation, were still there, and he supposed it was not the design of the House to cut off the communication with Spain.

After some explanation by Mr. SMITH, Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the section.

This motion caused some debate, and at length was carried—yeas 43 nays 40.

Mr. KITTERA moved to strike out the limitation section, but was not seconded.

The Committee then rose and reported the amendments.

It being a late hour, the House adjourned without taking up the amendments.

Intercourse with France.

H. OF R.

WEDNESDAY, February 19.

Mr. D. FOSTER from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Moses Gill, Esq., praying for the payment of 8,400 dollars of Loan-office certificates, and interest thereon, issued by the State of Georgia, which had been rejected at the Treasury, as not constituting a claim against the United States.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury was submitted to the Committee of the House, with which it was their opinion that it would be proper for the House to concur, and that it would not be expedient for the United States to assume the payment of the said certificates.

The report was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. HARRISON, chairman of the committee appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, alterations may be necessary in the laws relative to the Northwestern Territory, made a report, proposing the following resolution to the House.

“Resolved, That all the salt springs and marshes in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio ought to be leased out for the term of not less than — years, nor more than — years.”

The report was referred to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order for Thursday.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The House then took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill “further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof.”

That part of the report going to strike out the seventh section, which considered the whole of the Colony of Hispaniola a dependency of the French Republic, was disagreed to, 48 to 42, so that the section remains.

The tenth section provides that if the President should deem it proper to open the intercourse with any part of France, or its dependencies, so that the residence of a Consul at such place may be necessary, then such Consul or Agent shall be allowed an annual salary not exceeding — dollars, and shall be prohibited from engaging in any kind of traffic.

In Committee the blank was filled with $3,000.

Mr. GALLATIN wished to know why a salary should be granted in the present instance, when none was allowed to other residents in a like situation.?

Mr. SMITH answered, that the present was very different from other consulships; there it required only a common merchant to manage the business relating to shipping, sailors, &c., but in this, ministerial powers, for negotiation, was contemplated. A person qualified for that purpose must be employed; it could not be expected that any man would go to reside in a climate which endangered his life, without a compensation somewhat adequate to the profits he could make by engaging in commerce, which other consuls were permitted to do. In the present case, as had been experienced, this privilege would much injure the general commercial interest of the United States, because such resident would have the earliest opportunity to take advantage of the intercourse being opened.

Mr. RUTLEDGE also made some explanatory observations, and the motion adopted in Committee for filling the blank with $3,000 was agreed to.

Mr. HARPER renewed a motion which he made yesterday, but which was negative, to prevent any neutrals carrying on trade from the United States to France, &c., at all. He contended this was the spirit of the former bill, and the idea of the friends of it at its passage, although it might have proved inefficient to its object. He called for the yeas and nays on it; which, after a long debate, were taken and decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—Bailey Bartlett, Jonathan Brace, John Brown, Christopher G. Champlin, William Cooper, William Craik, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Franklin Davenport, William Edmond, Thomas Evans, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Jonathan Freeman, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Elizur Goodrich, Edwin Gray, Roger Griswold, Robert Goodloe Harper, Archibald Henderson, James H. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

Mr. WALN then introduced an amendment he yesterday proposed to the second section, which reads thus: “That, excepting for foreign ships or vessels owned, hired, or employed by persons permanently residing in foreign countries, and without the limits of the United States, and commanded and wholly navigated by foreigners, no clearance for a foreign voyage shall be granted to any ship or vessel, &c., without a bond being given that it shall not enter a French port.”

A motion was made to strike out the words above printed in italic, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the word “Europe.”

The question on this motion was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 50, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—George Baer, Bailey Bartlett, John Bird, Jonathan Brace, John Brown, Christopher G. Champlin, William Cooper, William Craik, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Franklin Davenport, William Edmond, Thomas Evans, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Jonathan Freeman, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, THURSDAY, February 20.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

The engrossed bill, entitled, "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," was read, and, on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" Mr. RANDOLPH called for the yeas and nays.

A long debate ensued on the passage of the bill. Messrs. MACON, EGGLESTON, and NICHOLAS, spoke against its passage, and Messrs. MARSHALL and GALLATIN in its favor.

The bill was passed—yeas 68, nays 28, as follows:

TENNESSEE LANDS.

Mr. HARRISON, on account of an act lately passed by the Legislature of Tennessee, respecting certain land situated in that State, the title of which is disputed—whether belonging to the United States, or to that State—laid on the table a resolution for a committee to be appointed to make inquiry and report such facts as may come to their knowledge respecting the same, together with their agreement respecting the title thereof; and if found to be the property of the United States, to report as to the expediency of selling the same.

CREDIT FOR DUTIES.

Mr. SPAIGHT proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any, and what, further credit, may be given for duties on the articles of produce imported from the West Indies into the ports of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise."

The resolution was agreed to.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON proposed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That it appears to this House that a person, calling himself Jonathan Robbins, and claiming to be a citizen of the United States, impressed on board a British ship-of-war, was committed for trial in one of the courts of the United States for the alleged crime of piracy and murder, committed on the high seas, on board the British frigate Hermione: That a requisition being, subsequent to such commitment, made by the British Minister to the Executive of the United States, for the delivery of the said person (under the name of Thomas Nash) as a fugitive, under the 27th article of the Treaty with Great Britain, the President of the United States did, by a letter written from the Department of State to the Judge who committed the said person for trial, officially declare his opinion to the said Judge that he 'considered an offence committed on board a public ship of war on the high seas to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs; and, in consequence of such opinion and instruction did advise and request the said Judge to deliver up the person so claimed to the agent of Great Britain, who should appear to receive him, provided only that the stipulated evidence of his criminality should be produced. That in compliance with such advice and request of the President of the United States, the said person so committed for trial was, by the Judge of the district of South Carolina, without any presentment or trial by jury, or any investigation of his claim to be a citizen of the United States, delivered up to an officer of his Britannic Majesty, and afterwards tried by a court martial, and executed on a charge of mutiny and murder.

"Resolved, That, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States declares that the Judiciary power shall extend to all questions arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties, of the United States, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction: and, also, that the trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury; and that such trial shall be held in the State where such crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, then at such place or places as Congress may by law have directed; and inasmuch as it is directed by law that the offence of murder committed on the high seas shall be deemed to be piracy and murder, and that 'all crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, shall be tried in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought:' therefore the several questions, whether the alleged crime of piracy and murder was committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain; whether it comes within the purview of the said twenty-seventh article; and whether a person stating that he was an American citizen, and had committed the act of which he was accused in attempting to regain his liberty from illegal imprisonment, ought to be delivered up, without any investigation of his claims to citizenship, or inquiry into the facts alleged in his defence, are all matters exclusively of judicial inquiry, as arising from treaties, laws, Constitutional provisions, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

"Resolved, That the decision of those questions by the President of the United States, against the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in a case where those courts had already assumed and exercised jurisdiction: and his advice and request to the Judge of the District Court that the person thus charged should be delivered up, provided only such evidence of his criminality should be produced as would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, are a dangerous interference of the Executive with Judicial decisions; and that the compliance with such advice and request on the part of the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, is a sacrifice of the Constitutional independence of the Judicial power, and exposes the administration thereof to suspicion and reproach."

The question of reference to the Committee of the Whole was taken and carried—yeas 55.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 21.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT presented a petition of a number of natives of Great Britain, residing at Mount Pleasant, State of New York, praying some modification of the last naturalization act. It was moved, first, that it be referred to a select committee; which was carried, and three members appointed. It was further moved that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise; which was negatived.

UNIFORM BANKRUPTCY.

The bill for establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was read a third time.

Mr. BISHOP, after mentioning some amendments which were still necessary to the bill, moved its recommitment to the Committee of the whole House for that purpose; which was negatived, as was also a motion by Mr. DAVIS, for the postponement of taking the question until Monday.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative, the House being equally divided—yeas 48, nays 48—the SPEAKER declaring himself with the yeas.

YEAS—George Baer, Bailey Bartlett, James A. Bayard, John Bird, Jonathan Brace, John Brown, Christopher G. Champlin, William Cooper, William Craik, Samuel W. Dana, Franklin Davenport, George Dent, Joseph Dickson, William Edmond, Thomas Evans, Abiel Foster, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Elizur Goodrich, William Gordon, Roger Griswold, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Hartley, Archibald Henderson, James H. Otis, Thomas Pinckney, Leven Powell, John Reed, John Rutledge, jun., Samuel Sewall, James Sheafe, William Shepard, Samuel Smith, George Thatcher, John Chew Thomas, Richard Thomas, Peleg Wadsworth, Robert Wain, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—Willis Alston, Theodorus Bailey, Phanuel Bishop, Robert Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, Joseph Eggleston, Lucas Elmendorf, Dwight Foster, John Fowler, Albert Gallatin, Samuel Goode, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, William Barry Grove, John A. Spaight, Richard Stanford, David Stone, Thomas Sumter, Benjamin Taliaferro, John Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. DAVIS, from the select committee to whom was referred the petition of John Mountjoy, made a report that it appeared the petitioner was entitled to bounty lands for services in the Army, and owing to some accident he had never obtained it. The committee therefore reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to issue to John Mountjoy, late Captain in the service of the United States, the land warrant No. 2495 for three hundred acres of bounty land."

A motion was made that the House agree to the resolution, but on Mr. D. FOSTER wishing a general system to be adopted, in order to take up a number of cases of the same nature, and, as he observed, the subject was now before the Senate, the report was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

ISAAC ZANE.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Zane, praying a fee simple for certain lands on which he had settled, and which was granted to him by the Wyandot nation of Indians, prior to a treaty by which those lands became the property of the United States, reported a resolution for a committee to be appointed to bring in a bill to convey the same accordingly.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

DUTIES ON STILLs.

Mr. HARPER also made a report from the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of David Wiley, and others, praying exemption from their part of the duty on stills, on account of an accidental want of water, so as to prevent them making use of their stills. The Committee were of opinion that these accidents may frequently occur, and that it was not proper for the revenue to sustain loss thereby, and therefore reported that the prayer of the aforesaid petitioners ought not to be granted, and that they have leave to withdraw the same.

The House took up the report for a second reading, and agreed thereto.

ESTIMATES FOR THE YEAR 1800.

Mr. HARPER also made a report from the Committee of Ways and Means of the estimate of moneys necessary for the service of the present year. The following is a summary of the statement:

The amount of necessary supply for the present year, agreeably to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury - - - - -	$15,393,034 11
From this is to be deducted one million, on account of the suspension of further enlistments in the Army - - - - -	1,000,000 00
Add to this a suspension of building of the six seventy-four gun ships for the present year, which the committee conceived it expedient to do—the present year's estimate for that item was - - - - -	600,000 00
	1,600,000 00
Loans, a sum to be provided for in the present year of - - - - -	13,793,034 11
To meet this expenditure, the receipts of the present year were estimated at - - - - -	9,301,258 51
Deduct this revenue from the aforesaid expenditure, would leave a sum to be provided for, above the revenue of the present year, of - - - - -	4,491,775 60
There remained in the Treasury, of the last year's appropriation - - - - -	2,159,377 10
But, as part of this would be wanted for contracts yet remaining due, not more than one million would be left on hand towards this year's expenditure, which, deducted, - - - - -	1,000,000 00
Would leave a balance to be procured, over and above the revenue, of - - - - -	3,491,775 60

The committee reported that they have turned their attention to the object of revenue, but had not yet decided as to their report, and therefore they thought proper to submit a resolution to the House to authorize the President to procure, by loan, for the services of the present year, the sum of $3,500,000, at such rates as he may find most for the interest of the United States.

The report was ordered to be printed and referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

EULOGIUM ON THE CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate had this day come to the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the Senate will to-morrow, at half past 12 o'clock, meet in the Senate Chamber, and from thence walk in procession to the church in Race street, to hear the eulogium to be pronounced on the character of General Washington."

Ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER said he was requested, by a member of the Catholic church, to inform the House that seats were provided for the accommodation of such members as would please to attend to hear the delivery of the oration to-morrow.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said, before the receipt of the message from the Senate, he had intended to move that when the House adjourn they do adjourn till Monday; but the Senate having informed the House that they intended to walk in procession, he conceived this House ought to come to a similar resolution, and moved the following:

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives will meet to-morrow, at half past 12 o'clock at their Chamber, and from thence walk in procession to the church in Race street, to hear the eulogium there to be pronounced on the character of General Washington."

It was objected to this resolution, that it had not been contemplated this House would walk in procession, no arrangement having been made for that purpose; and that as it might be the wish of several members to attend the oration at the Catholic church in preference to the one in Race street, it ought to be left to their own option.

The question on the resolution was put and negatived—yeas 40, nays 43.

SUNDRY BILLS.

The House took up the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for salvage in case of recapture, and concurred therein.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate had passed the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to the act, entitled 'An act for regulating the grants of lands for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,' with sundry amendments.

The bill and amendments were read and referred to the select committee who reported it.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee appointed for that purpose, having obtained leave, reported a bill to extend the privilege of obtaining patents

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," when the bill was agreed to without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, February 24.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to allow drawbacks of duty on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. THATCHER, from the Post Road Committee, reported a bill "to alter and establish sundry post roads;" which was twice read, and committed to the whole House, and made the order for Thursday.

Mr. DANA reported a bill to provide for the execution of the 27th article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, made with Great Britain; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House for to-morrow.

Mr. HARPER, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," reported their concurrence with the amendments proposed.

The House took up the amendments, and agreed to all, but one. The title was altered to that of "An act providing for the second census, or the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States."

WESTERN LANDS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report made the 18th instant, by the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws providing for the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That all the townships directed to be sold, either in quarter townships or in tracts of one mile square, by the act "providing for the sale of the lands of the United States, in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river," shall be subdivided into half sections, containing, as nearly as may be, three hundred and twenty acres each: the additional expense of surveying to be paid by the purchaser, at the rate of three dollars per tract.

5th. If any tract shall not be completely paid for within one year after the date of the last payment, the tract to be sold in such manner as shall be provided by law; and after paying the balance due to the United States, including interest, the surplus, if any, to be returned to the original purchaser.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BRACE, Mr. GORDON, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. GALLATIN, do prepare and bring in the same.

SALT SPRINGS AND LICKS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report made the 19th instant, by the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the laws providing for the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the Ohio; and, after spending some time therein, the committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

CASE OF MOSES WHITE.

The report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Moses White, praying liquidation of his claim as aid-de-camp, in the Revolutionary Army, to General Hazen, was read. The committee reported a resolution to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay the claim.

Objection was made to the claim, because the commanding officer was only a Brigadier General pro tem., and not in full commission, and that, even if the claim had been just, the statute of limitation had barred it; that there were a number of cases not only equal but superior in claim to the present, which had been opposed on the ground of the statute, and, therefore, this could be no claim under the present law and usage, since no law allowed any supernumerary aid; and if supernumerary aids were appointed, they never had extra pay.

On the other hand, it was contended that the claim was just; that application was made long since for a settlement of this claim; that others had been allowed their pay under similar circumstances; that the only objection made at the Treasury was that the commander held the office by brevet, and not by commission; but it was essentially the same. If the claim was ever just, and the services actually performed, it ought to be granted; that there was no danger of establishing a precedent in this case, because there was no claim precisely of a similar nature.

The Committee of the Whole disagreed to the resolution, 37 to 48; which disagreement was reported to the House, was taken up therein, and agreed to—48 to 33.

THE FISHERIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to continue in force an act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

In the Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to fill the blank of years with ten. The Committee rose, and reported the amendment.

Mr. GALLATIN thought it would be proper for Congress to examine into this subject before they proceeded too far, to know whether it was an object worthy of notice or not; and, further, to bring it into some proportion to the tax on salt, the additional duty on which was prescribed to about two years from this time.

Mr. SEWALL thought that there was a necessity of giving this time to the law, in order to remove the discouragements under which fishermen had labored, and which alone could encourage the trade to be carried on to any extent, because this law was meant to operate as a bounty; but he did not think the amount now paid as a bounty was equal to the single duty on salt.

Several gentlemen spoke on this subject. At length the amendment was carried, 40 to 26, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 25.

Mr. GALLATIN proposed the two following resolutions, which were agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to prepare and report a bill to amend an "Act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river," be instructed to prepare and report a bill appropriating a tract of land sufficient to satisfy the claims of the Nova Scotia and Canada refugees, and designating the mode in which their respective bounties in land shall be located.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House, with the approbation of the Speaker be authorized to employ such farther assistance as may be necessary in his office during the present session, to be paid out of the contingent funds of this House."

THE FISHERIES.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein, and for other purposes therein mentioned," was read the third time, and on the question, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. MACON observed that he could see no reason why this article of provision should be entitled to a bounty in preference to beef, pork, and fish, which required salt in their curing, as well as codfish. It was, in fact, taxing all other species of labor in order to give a bounty to this particular one.

Mr. SMITH said that, at the first passage of this bill, it was considered as a drawback on the salt used, and, in that view, the same benefit was extended to all other salted articles of export. In the salting of beef, pork, mackerel, or herrings, a certain quantity of salt was estimated to be used in each barrel, but it was not so with codfish, and, therefore, a certain sum was supposed to be equal to the drawback. This sum very possibly operated as a bounty; but even if it did so, and was brought forward with that ostensible design, Mr. S. considered it very proper; for how, he asked, could a navy be supported if there was not some nursery wherein to increase the number of our seamen?

The bill was then passed—yeas 51.

LANDS FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

Mr. HARRISON from the committee to whom were referred several amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for regulating the grants of lands for military services, &c., reported their agreement with some of the said amendments and their disagreement with others.

FEBRUARY, 1800.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

The House took up the report and agreed to it. The Senate afterwards asked a conference thereupon, which was agreed to, and three members appointed on the part of the House.

GILBERT DENCH.

Mr. OTIS presented the petition of Gilbert Dench, praying pay for certain contracts which he had fulfilled during the war. A motion was made to refer it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. D. FOSTER wished to know why it was to be referred to that committee. This petition had several times been referred to that committee and reported against. Why the committee should so repeatedly be harassed he could not tell.

Mr. OTIS said he had no hidden motive in making his motion; it was impossible for him to know the particulars of the claim; however, he had been informed that some new facts would come before the committee if it was submitted to them.

The petition was not referred, 26 only voting for it.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Message of the President respecting Jonathan Robbins, a short debate took place whether the Committee should take up the business of the resolution first proposed by Mr. BAYARD, or those subsequently offered by Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. BAYARD seemed inclined to withdraw his motion, but the Committee seeming of opinion that both resolutions were within their jurisdiction, and that they might proceed on either, the question was taken whether the Committee would proceed on the resolutions of Mr. LIVINGSTON, and carried in the affirmative. Messrs. BAYARD, RUTLEDGE, OTIS, &c., voting in favor of the question, and Messrs. LIVINGSTON, NICHOLAS, &c., against it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then entered upon an argument in support of the resolutions which he had some days before submitted to the House, and which now were taken up. Soon after he began the discussion, he was proceeding to read a deposition of Jonathan Robbins, and certificates accompanying the same, to prove himself a citizen of the United States, in which the deponent swore, before the court of South Carolina, that he was born at Danbury in the State of Connecticut, and that he was impressed from on board the American brig Betsey, by the crew of the British frigate, about two years before, where he was detained contrary to his will until the mutiny occurred.

Mr. BAYARD opposed the reference to a fact so incompetently authenticated as the report of a case upon newspaper testimony, especially when, if it had been the desire of the gentleman to have introduced it as evidence, it was extremely easy to have procured the record of the court before he proceeded on his allegations. If such evidence as this was to be admitted, other and perhaps more important evidence might next be introduced to impose on the Committee. Besides, it certainly must be looked upon as ex parte evidence, which it was impossible to repel. Mr. B. submitted to the Chair whether it would be in order to admit any fresh evidence to support the resolutions, when all the documents which had been asked for, and which had come to the knowledge of the Executive, had been submitted to the House.

Mr. GALLATIN, on the question of order, contended for the admission: this document, he said, was referred to as authentic, in his letter. He says, "That, by the proceedings before that Judge, (Bee,) as they have been published, it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash did assume the name of Jonathan Robbins, and make oath that he was a native of the State of Connecticut," &c. Certainly it cannot be deemed improper to refer to the identical document there mentioned. If it was proper for the Secretary of State to make the allusion, the House could take it up under the same idea. He did not think it was introduced as evidence before the Committee.

Mr. DANA said he was very sorry the gentleman had been interrupted; he could not think of admitting it as evidence, but the gentleman might read it as part of his speech, which perhaps might otherwise have a chasm in it.

Mr. BAYARD was fully of opinion, with the mover of these resolutions, that it was a very serious business; he believed there was a very serious object in view. He believed the affidavit was introduced as evidence, else why should the gentleman have taken this in connexion after he had been stating the facts contained in the Message?

It was further said that this deposition was referred to by the Secretary. Surely then it was introduced as evidence upon that authority; but how had the gentleman been assured that this was the same deposition, an extract of which was taken by the Secretary? Did it follow, that because the Secretary referred to a printed paper, that this was the authentic one? He presumed no gentleman would vouch for the veracity of this paper. The Secretary had only extracted from the document such parts as he deemed necessary for the information of the House, supposing this was the case meant.

Mr. NICHOLAS was surprised that the gentleman should oppose the reading of what he supposed the Secretary had authenticated copies of in his office. The Secretary had certainly referred to an authenticated affidavit which was published, and it was presumable this was the one. The result of this declaration must be, if the gentleman thinks the House is imposed upon by a reference to a false paper, that the Committee must rise, and the House ask for the authentic copies which may aid their decision.

But Mr. N. thought the information was sufficiently authentic; the House had asked the papers of the President; some papers were sent, and, instead of sending this original paper, he had referred to the printed report. This had never been contradicted, and had every appearance of authenticity. He really hoped that the objection would not be insisted on, and the discussion be arrested in this stage.

Mr. RUTLEDGE hoped the paper might be read, but not for the purpose for which it was introduced; he wished it to be read as part of the gentleman's speech, but he did not think this was the proper time. He did not think the gentleman had come to that chasm in his speech which was supposed by the gentleman from Connecticut. The gentleman had produced facts and stated evidence, among which he was proceeding to introduce this paper. Mr. R. said he was willing to procure all the information, and that other gentlemen should also be possessed of it; on which account, when the subject was first mentioned, he moved its reference to a select committee. In that case, all the facts and every necessary light would have been procured; but it was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEDGWICK thought, as this was merely a question of order, and as the acts and deliberations of the Committee of the Whole were prescribed, it could only have been proper to have made it an act of the House. The Committee of the Whole, he said, were limited to the documents referred to it by the House; and if they found them insufficient, it was their duty to rise and go to the House for more.

If it was the intention of the gentleman to read this as evidence, (which we must suppose was intended,) and it was not evidence, it might shed darkness, but it could not illuminate. He was surprised that gentlemen who were sitting there in their inquisitorial capacity should bring forward charges of a serious nature against two officers of high confidence, and deservedly so, in the public opinion, upon evidence which cannot be deemed authority, when, for merely asking, they could receive that which was authentic. Mr. S. said he was not afraid of the reading of any papers whatever, on any subject, because he must profess a desire to come at the whole truth; if there be a man, who possesses the public confidence unworthily, strip him of that confidence, and his power too, but do it not, sir, on a bare newspaper publication.

Mr. S. said that his reasons for opposing the reading was not because the paper was deficient of that formality which courts of justice required; he should therefore waive formalities, except the evidence should appear evidently false. But the deposition itself he believed to be perfectly irrelevant to the object of inquiry. It was not, in his opinion, material whether this man claimed to be an American citizen or not, nor was it material whether the paper in question was in the office or not. He thought the only inquiry to be whether the President had interfered with the Judicial authority, or not; and whether the Judge had been guilty of a breach of his duty in obeying the orders given him by the Executive of the United States. There was, to be sure, allusions made to a printed trial, but it was by the Secretary of State, and not by the President. He had said no such thing, and therefore he was not culpable. The only thing, he believed, which the President considered, was, what must appear a very clear and well-ascertained fact, to wit: that a ship or vessel of any Power was to be considered as within the jurisdiction of that Power to whom it belongs, and not whether the man was an American citizen or not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he did wish to read this paper as part of his speech; and he believed it a very material part, because it was a justification of a point which he wished to establish; he wished to show the Committee that Jonathan Robbins claimed to be an American citizen, and that he said he was impressed. This he swore to in court; and that he did so, he hoped would be admitted. He said he only introduced it with this view. Surely he could not be so far mistaken in his law knowledge as to be thought to have said that the culprit could be evidence in his own behalf. If he did say he was a citizen, then the matter, upon examination, must appear more serious than gentlemen would be willing to think.

Did the Speaker think it was his desire, Mr. L. asked, to criminate the man who stood so deservedly high in the public estimation? Surely the mere reading of this paper could not contribute to that crimination, since it was, with the other papers, furnished to the House as documents which were asked for by the House. The House received these papers (these among others, for to this the Secretary referred the House) to assist them in forming their judgment. If "newspaper evidence" was given to the House, (if authenticated affidavits,) who then was to blame? The House asked for all papers relative to the subject; the President furnished these, and therefore if any blame attached, it must be to him.

It was said that this paper was in the office of the Secretary of State; that this was not an act of the President; that this was a report of the Secretary of State, and that he only was answerable for it. Sir, said Mr. L., when the President says that he, in conformity to the request of the House, had ordered the Secretary to bring him the papers, and that he submits them to the House for their consideration, does he not take the act off the Secretary and appropriate it to himself? Certainly he does.

The conduct of gentlemen must appear a little strange when it is considered that a part of these papers—such as certain affidavits from Connecticut that Robbins was not born there, and a letter from the British Admiral in the West Indies, stating that he was an Irishman, and entered into the service—I say it is unaccountable that gentlemen are willing to admit this part of the report, which was never required by the House, and refuse another part which was, and of which it was the duty of the House to be informed, if information could be had. Information is sent, but it must not be admitted! Sir, this is to be considered as an act of the President; it is to be considered that this affidavit is quoted, and ought to be wholly read, since it is the part upon which we are to proceed to the investigation.

Mr. BAYARD had no doubt but it was the gentleman's intention to impress the force of the facts contained in that paper upon the minds of that Committee; and to suppose it would have no impression would be absurd. It would afterwards be said that this man was admitted to be an impressed American citizen, and that he was praiseworthy in committing what would then be called the homicide. The decision of the Committee would be much affected, he said, by the kind of evidence which was adduced. If this was admitted, it would be impossible to ascertain the extent of the principle. Other depositions may be produced—indeed, he had no doubt but the gentleman could get proof to any point which he might think it material to ascertain. In saying this, he did not mean to insinuate that any improper steps would be taken by that gentleman, but there were volunteers enough to be found who would step forward in order to answer a party purpose, and make oath of anything.

But the gentleman had now acknowledged that his reference to that paper was a work of supererogation; he now said that he only wanted to prove that the man claimed to be an impressed American citizen. This is admitted in the letter of the Secretary of State. Sir, said Mr. B., you are about to inculpate the conduct of the President, and of the District Judge of South Carolina; and, to do this, will you do it on the affidavit of a man at the hazard of his life, a man who could commit murder and piracy, for which he was then going to be executed? It was the last resource of the wretch himself.

Mr. B. had no doubt but the gentleman would have brought that paper as evidence; and the evidence, though derived from the vilest possible source, he would certainly have turned to serve his point. With this idea, and for the sake of consistency, (for the rules of the House would admit, in any other part of the examination, what was now admitted,) and viewing the principle as injurious, he had thought it his duty to put a stop to it in time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON supposed he should increase the astonishment of gentlemen still more when he declared that he did not believe a word of the affidavit; but he believed Nash was an Irishman, and that he entered on board and committed all the crimes charged to him. It was clear that this affidavit could not be evidence. In admitting this, he believed he did not surrender one point of the resolutions; he should prove that all which he wished to ascertain was that such claim was made to the court.

Mr. GALLATIN did not consider the question to be whether this should be considered as evidence, but whether the gentleman might be permitted to read the paper—whether as part of his speech or whatsoever else. It was certainly no legal evidence; and, therefore, if a trial was holding, or if the ground was an impeachment, refusal would be proper; but upon what ground the gentleman was interrupted at this time was inconceivable, except it was to throw all possible impediments in the way of the investigation. The letter from the British Admiral to the British Consul was not legal evidence; but yet that was inserted in the report of the Executive; that was sent, no doubt, to disprove some fact which was related. What was that fact? Why, that this man laid claim to citizenship. Surely, while the gentleman was stating the facts contained in his resolutions, he had a right to elucidate those facts by reading a paper so intimately connected therewith.

6th CON.—18

Mr. G. said he did not know what use the gentleman made of this paper, but it is certainly proper to hear what he intended by the reference, before he ought to have been stopped. There certainly could be no doubt, Mr. G. thought, that the Secretary of State knew this affidavit to be authoritative, by the reference made to it. If this paper could not be read, for himself he should wish to procure further information before he should think proper to proceed.

Mr. BAYARD asked where could be the necessity of proving a fact which every member of the House was willing to admit. All acknowledged that Nash claimed to be an American citizen; but perhaps the wish of the gentleman was to have additional light on this subject, on which account he introduced the deposition. But, Mr. B. said, he was willing only to proceed upon what the House knew from the documents before them, and not take a step on precarious ground. It must be well known what the gentleman wanted to get this admission for; he no doubt wished to prove that, upon his own mere suggestion, he was an American citizen, and that he was impressed—he was entitled to a trial by jury in this country, and on that account the act of sending him away was unconstitutional. This would lead to an extensive field of argument. If there was any necessity for more evidence, or to call witnesses to the bar of the House, let proper measures be taken to procure them, but let them not come forward in any other way.

Mr. DANA read the resolution first offered to the House for a call for papers relative to Jonathan Robbins; this was answered, he said, by the Secretary of State, that no requisition or proceedings had been had in that name; but he presumed allusion was made to the case of Thomas Nash, concerning whom proceedings were had in the district court of South Carolina; in that way, and that only, the Secretary made reference to the printed report. In this blundering way, Mr. D. said, the business was begun. [He was called to order.] In addition to this, he said, the proceedings of gentlemen were erroneous; but, notwithstanding that, Mr. D. said, he would gratify the feelings of the gentleman, as far as his vote would go, for him to read it, but only as part of his speech. No doubt he wished to support some point of his argument by it, and in that view he had a right to read it; but that it was evidence, he denied.

Mr. LEE said he did not profess to understand the rules of the House perfectly, but he must indulge a presumption that they could have but one grand object in view—to encourage and maintain full and fair discussion on every subject, whatever it might be, that should come before the House. That being necessary, surely a rule must be bad, indeed, that would bar a gentleman from reading anything that might tend to elucidate this subject. He therefore thought it the duty of the Committee to allow the member from New York to read this and every other paper which might enable him to proceed on so serious a charge as the one exhibited in the resolutions. Were not gentlemen fully adequate to judge what may be wrong when he should come to the application? If he asked the papers of the President of the United States, was he to be content with those only which should come through his Ministers? That could not be the true ground of proceeding.

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

Suppose the gentleman should be stopped from reading what he thinks material, and the resolutions which he has introduced should afterwards be negatived, I pray you to say, sir, said Mr. L., what would be the consequence? Would not the people say that no other possible decision could be had by the House, because the Committee of the Whole laid their hand upon every effort the gentleman used to substantiate his charges? They certainly will; and no act can more increase the means of opposition to the measures of the Government.

Upon this ground he hoped the gentleman would be permitted to proceed, and the whole truth be made to appear. If gentlemen should determine it out of order, he would move that the Committee rise, in order to get hold of all the authentic papers.

The CHAIRMAN having stated his reasons, concluded with an opinion that the member could not proceed to read the affidavit.

Mr. GALLATIN appealed to the Committee from the decision of the Chair; when there appeared 39 in favor of the decision, and 48 against it.

At this point the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

Mr. OTIS again called the consideration of the House to the petition of Gilbert Dench, which was yesterday refused a reference to the Committee of Claims; he stated the claim in strong colors, and added that new evidences were to be exhibited, on which account he moved its reference to a select committee.

A reconsideration was moved by Mr. KITCHELL, and the petition was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WRECKED VESSELS.

Mr. SPAIGHT proposed a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Navigation be directed to inquire whether any, and what, regulations ought to be made in respect to vessels, goods, wares, and merchandise, wrecked on the coasts; also, of such goods, wares, and merchandise, as may be saved from wrecks and brought into the ports of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise."

This resolution was agreed to.

CESSION OF CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BRACE called up the following resolution for consideration, which he presented on the 18th instant:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of accepting from the State of Connecticut a cession of jurisdiction of the territory west of Pennsylvania, commonly called the Western Reserve of Connecticut, and that they report by bill or otherwise."

The resolution was agreed to, and seven members appointed accordingly.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions proposed by Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. BAYARD, on the affair of Jonathan Robbins. The small progress, Mr. D. said, which was made yesterday in the discussion, fully convinced his mind that nothing at all would be done in it; besides, were he convinced that the subject would be impartially conducted, he did not know of any possible good that could arise from the adoption of the resolutions. If there had been any error in the proceedings of the Executive, he conceived that error would correct itself. If there was an improper interference, he was certain it could not have arisen from improper motives, and therefore he sincerely hoped he should not be called upon to give an opinion on the subject. Nor, on the other hand, was he at all prepared to compliment the Executive, or any officer of the Government, for having done what he thought to be right. If he had done right, it was his duty. He did not think it of any great importance; but, most assuredly, if the argument was extended, it would be made a case of much importance. It was better, however, to let the case of Jonathan Robbins sleep in the Committee of the Whole, where it then was. He was not prepared to criminate, nor was he prepared to applaud.

Mr. D. did not think the evidence before the House was sufficient to form a decision upon, and he professed himself unable to make up a determinate opinion; but, if he could form any, the deficiency of evidence furnished must raise his suspicion. Reference was yesterday made to a paper—it might be authentic or it might not—but it was impossible to say to what papers gentlemen might be disposed to refer; and for gentlemen to sit there as judges, having papers read, the authenticity of which it was impossible to know, was to judge in the dark. He hoped that if the House were not prepared to discharge the Committee of the Whole, they at least were prepared for a call for such authentic papers as could be procured; for, from the present documents, it was impossible to form a correct judgment upon this very disagreeable and irksome business. He had no doubt but many gentlemen had formed their judgments one way or the other, but he had not.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that no gentleman had a higher respect for the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky than himself; but, however disagreeable it might be, he must differ from him in his present opinion. He really hoped the gentleman would reconsider the motion he had made, and not stop the gentleman from New York in this early stage of the business. If there were any defects in the papers, and their authenticity was questionable, it must not arise from the gentleman from New York, but from those whose duty it was to furnish all the facts relative to the subject. He was obliged to read a printed paper, because those with whom the authoritative copies are have not thought proper to furnish the House with them. He hoped, if a stop was put to the proceedings, it would not be to discharge the Committee, but to call for authentic copies of all the papers within the reach of the Government. It must be acknowledged that the man whose case the House are considering did put in his claims to citizenship, and to the protection of his country on that account. If that acknowledgment is refused on account of the paper which has been produced being a newspaper, reference must be made to what is within the reach of the House—more authentic papers.

The gentleman had supposed that most of the members had made up their minds on the subject without other papers. Where he procured that information Mr. R. could not tell, but certain it was that his mind was not made up; he professed to be still in a state of incertitude. He therefore was sorry the gentleman had not delayed to make his motion until it should be known by the House whether the gentleman from New York had any further evidence to adduce. Could he undertake to say that his mind would not be made up, and the subject appear to him in a very different point of view, after a full and fair discussion?

Mr. R. thought the very reason which the gentleman had given for his motion would operate as a strong argument against it; with him it certainly had that impression. He thought a discussion was more proper to remove incertitude from the mind, than that, because such a state existed, the Committee should be discharged. The public mind, he believed, was very uneasy upon the subject, and this state of disquiet was not to be eluded; he therefore ought to have withheld his motion, that a discussion might be had, from which the people could draw their deductions. If, after all the evidence that was to be produced, he could draw a conclusion similar to that expressed by the gentleman, Mr. R. said he would cordially join with him that no expression ought to be made by the House without being well supported by facts.

Mr. H. LEE considered the motion would have the complete effect any gentleman could wish whose desire it was to reprobate the conduct of the Administration of our Government. How could the motion be necessary—how be useful? If they were to ask more evidence, said Mr. L., I would vote for it to be produced; they have brought the subject before the House—let us see it in the purest colors which it can be placed in. We are ready to meet them here; we are willing they should have every evidence that can be obtained to elucidate their charge; but let not the Executive be hung up to reproach without a trial; let not suspicion be encouraged, which must have all the effects of a substantiated charge. I wish them to go on with the discussion, that all the truth may be disclosed, and every fair light be given which the case will bear; for now the people of the United States have their eyes fixed upon our proceedings on this important question.

Mr. MACON was in favor of the motion. If the Committee of the Whole was not to be discharged, he hoped at least the subject would not be postponed till the public business of the session was over; there were many public bills, he said, that must be passed. The House was called upon to judge with almost no testimony, and yet upon this uncertain ground, perhaps a whole week might be spent of the most precious time of the House; for if the House was to rise at the time proposed, the loss of this time would certainly be felt.

As to the impression it would leave on the minds of the people, they had as many facts to judge from as the House, and they certainly would form an opinion, whether the House did so, or not. Gentlemen were very much mistaken, he said, if they undertook to lead the people; they would think, and they would show what their judgment was when a proper time came for that purpose. The time the people would take to show their approbation or disapprobation of the measures of the Administration was at elections, and then they would do it.

Mr. SMITH said, if the object of the motion was to get better testimony, he thought it a very proper one; the House certainly ought to be possessed of the documents of the District Court of South Carolina, on this case, in an authentic form, and not from newspaper information. He professed himself to be in the precise situation of the mover, and, if called upon to vote without more evidence, should be at loss to know how to vote.

Mr. DANA was against the postponement of the subject, or the rising of the Committee. It was to be recollected that the business had assumed its present shape only in consequence of the zeal of the gentleman from New York, and his coadjutors, to censure the Executive. On the 7th of February, it was committed to the whole House; contrary to the opinion of a number of gentlemen, who wished the facts investigated by a select committee; thirteen days then elapsed before he had prepared his resolutions—resolutions not calculated to make an inquiry into the conduct of the Executive, but expressive of the most pungent censure upon his conduct. These resolutions were produced upon the papers which, at the desire of those gentlemen, were submitted to the House. The only question then, is, Do the papers upon which those resolutions are predicated warrant the censure contained in them, or not?—It certainly would be a high reproach to the very idea of a public inquisition to admit more evidence upon those grounds. Still, however, let gentlemen go on in their heterogeneous proceedings, the House would have the wisdom justly to appreciate the various attempts made to clear themselves of a predicament in which their over-arduous attempts to censure had thrown them.

Mr. SHEPARD thought the best way would be to let the resolutions take their course; they must be debated sooner or later, and the sooner they were disposed of the better. He was sorry they ever had been introduced in the House, but, as they were, he hoped no postponement would take place.

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

FEBRUARY, 1800.

Mr. LIVINGSTON conceived it his duty to answer the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) as to the resolutions being founded upon the facts then before the House. He did not think the facts were precisely sufficient to warrant every idea contained in the resolutions. When the original call for papers was agreed to by the House, he had hoped that something more authentic than newspaper testimony would have been referred to by the Executive; and upon that he was now compelled to act, if at all. The gentleman has said that my zeal and that of my coadjutors, to censure the Executive, has brought us into this situation. Who, sir, I would ask the gentleman, are my coadjutors? That gentleman himself was my coadjutor, and every gentleman in the House, because the resolution was adopted. The House directed the inquiry, and every gentleman must therefore take the burden, in part, with me. It was upon the suggestion of the notoriety of the facts that the inquiry was made, and now we are about to enter into the inquiry upon the facts with which we are furnished. We never can act but upon the evidence we have to guide that action. If the facts contained in the resolutions cannot be substantiated, if they shall fail to justify the conclusions we mean to draw from them, we certainly cannot be worthy of blame for not possessing more. I consider the affidavit yesterday produced as only supporting one branch of the conclusion that may be drawn from the whole. Whatever gentlemen may say as to the folly or hasty zeal of the resolutions, I can assure them that they are the result of many days of most serious reflection. They were not drawn in haste, and I am not afraid to say that they can be well substantiated—every fact contained in them. I am sufficiently prepared to proceed, and, therefore, hope this motion will be negatived, and a calm and deliberate investigation be had. If the deductions I shall make will not be satisfactory, then let it drop. I am, however, well satisfied of their force.

Mr. CRAIK said, that very early in this business he thought the House were entering into it very improperly, either having nothing at all to do with it, or else taking wrong measures, if they had; he thought then, and was yet of opinion, that if the object was to impeach the President, measures ought to have been taken accordingly. He never did look upon the House of Representatives as having either the power to censure or to approbate the conduct of the Executive, and, therefore, he equally disapproved of the resolutions of the gentlemen from New York and Delaware; and, upon that ground, he felt strongly inclined to vote with the gentleman from Kentucky for giving the whole subject the go by, and getting clear of it by any possible means.

The motion being to discharge the Committee of the Whole from both questions, was giving an opinion upon neither the one nor the other; and, therefore, it could not be received as a censure, agreeably to the apprehensions of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. LEE.) Mr. C. believed the people of the United States were too wise and too intelligent to form unjust conclusions upon the conduct of the House on this subject. They had the whole subject before them, they could judge, and they had a right to do it; but the House had not, except the avowed object was impeachment, which was not the case. The House had nothing to do with it, and therefore they ought not, in this unnecessary way, to spend time upon it.

Mr. HARPER agreed with the gentleman, that it would be folly for the House to spend time in useless discussion, which could lead to no decision; but, viewing this resolution as he did, he must conclude it of more importance; he thought it the direct road to an impeachment of the President of the United States, and, if so, surely it must appear important. The resolution declared, in express terms, that the Executive had exercised unconstitutional powers—one of the most dangerous crimes that he could commit. If he had so exercised his power, the inevitable consequence must be, that the President of the United States must be impeached by this House. Then, how could any gentleman say this was a trifling question, and one with which the House had nothing at all to do? Certainly no question can be more important.

If, as it respected the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, no motion had been made to criminate the Executive, he should not think it right to approbate his conduct; he should, in short, have been of an opinion that the House had nothing to do with it; but, it having been made, he should consider it very disrespectful not to express a sense of the propriety of the Executive conduct. He was willing, nay, desirous, of meeting the charge with all its terrors, and never would shrink from a decision on it. He presumed gentlemen had a meaning in what they did, and if they had any meaning, it must be that the House ought to proceed against the Executive. He did not think, however, from the total evidence which appeared, that there was one idea in the resolution but ought to be scouted with disdain from the House. He wished to have an opportunity of showing to the world that the House disdained to look with unconcern at a serious and unfounded charge upon the supreme Executive of the United States. He wished to give an opinion upon these charges, and treat them as they merited.

Mr. RUTLEDGE regretted that he could not join with his friend from Maryland, (Mr. CRAIK,) in thinking this consideration useless; he believed the attention of the people had been called to view this subject, and they were anxiously looking for a decision in some way. Neither did he think, with his honorable friend, that the House had nothing to do with it, because no impeachment could grow out of it. It was impossible to say what the gentleman meditated in his resolutions, but one thing was certain, if the gentleman had wished to promote an impeachment he could not have taken a more direct means for it, if the resolutions should be carried. He thought the friends of the Administration would act a very unfriendly part thereto, if they should agree to smother the business in this stage. The minds of the people had been raised to the highest pitch of expectation; they had been told, in certain public prints, that it loudly called for the interference of Congress; they had also been told, by an honorable member of the other House, that Congress ought to interfere. Attempts having been made to lead the public mind astray, and the House having proceeded so far on resolutions calculated to procure the object, it would be extremely wrong not to remove that disquiet by a suitable proceeding. It would not be useless to rescue the Executive from the very serious charges which had been thrown on him, and prove to the world that his actions had been consistent.

Mr. KITCHELL thought no good could arise from the investigation of this subject, because he did not know what was to be done in it, let the decision be what it might. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARPER) wished to have an opportunity of showing that every part of the resolution was built on false ground. Every gentleman in the House was not so fond of speaking nor of hearing as was that gentleman, and he hoped, merely on that account, that the House would not spend time on what (in his opinion) could not possibly lead to impeachment. What effect could a discussion have, but to show the world that there were parties in the House, and to raise a rancorous disposition? He did not know what there was in the resolution that could lead to an impeachment, nor did he know what the House, in their censorial capacity, had to do but to impeach. He believed it out of the power of the House to applaud. In short, he did not think they had anything to do with it.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped the discussion would proceed. Although there might not be sufficient ground on which to impeach the Executive, he could not agree that, therefore, no inquiry ought to be made into his conduct; there might be an error in his conduct, and yet no impeachment be necessary to be raised out of it; and, if so, it would be extremely wrong to suffer it to go out to the world without a decision, after the subject had once been taken up by the House. Where there might be no bad intention or wicked design, the action might be of a dangerous tendency, and proper to be inquired into, in order to express an opinion thereupon. Mr. N. said he was well pleased that his opinion, that the motion ought to be negatived, accorded with that of the gentleman from South Carolina, because it would afford him an opportunity of showing what he said he could show.

Mr. BAYARD had no doubt of the competency of the House either to impeach, to censure, or to approbate the conduct of the Executive, and of course both the resolutions were in their power.

Several gentlemen had intimated that the authentic evidence and the whole of the documents were not before the House, and that the Executive Department was to blame for the deficiency. It appeared that the gentleman himself had forgotten the import of his resolution; it called for such documents as might be in possession of the Department of State. Now, what could possibly be in possession of that Department? The President of the United States had his duties to perform, and the Judge of the district his duties; each had their separate documents; and, as neither interfered with the other, therefore, it could not be expected to be in the power of the President to furnish the papers belonging to the courts of South Carolina, any further than they came within the joint duties of both. Agreeably to treaty, the British Consul made a requisition for the person; a copy of this, and the several letters and instructions, were sent to the House, but it was not in the power of the Executive to order the Judge to furnish him with a record of the proceedings; he was not bound to furnish it if the President had called for it, and no doubt he had furnished the House with every paper in his possession.

The idea in the resolutions being to criminate the Judge as well as the Executive, Mr. B. thought he ought to have had an opportunity to furnish the papers of his department, and they ought to have been called for before his conduct was so deeply implicated.

Mr. OTIS said, when first the motion was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, he felt for a moment inclined to lean to it; the motives of that gentleman appeared to be so candid and liberal, that, for the moment, Mr. O. confessed, his feelings got the better of his reason. But a short reflection induced him to change an opinion thus hastily formed, and he felt satisfied that to vote with him, would be to display, in the conduct of gentlemen who wished to support the Administration of this country, worse than censure. He joined that gentleman in regret that it had gone so far, but certainly it was a subject of the most irritating nature possible: a charge the most serious; a breach of law by the Executive Magistrate, who is bound to support it and see it carried into effect. It is certainly a charge of much importance, and however disagreeable it might feel to him, Mr. O. said, he must vote that every argument should be used that could possibly tend to substantiate the charge, that nothing of truth might be hidden.

An insinuation was thrown out that the President had suppressed part of the information which ought to be had on this business. Lest this should take hold of the minds of gentlemen he would observe that the President, in his Message, says "I have directed the Secretary of State to lay before me copies of the papers intended, which I now transmit to Congress." If, therefore, there is any blame, it is not attached to the President, but to the Department of State: but it does not appear that the Secretary of State has any other papers in his possession than those the House are furnished with. This may be inferred from the readiness with which he furnished the papers he has given; he says he has no papers respecting any person of the name of Jonathan Robbins, "but by the proceedings before that Judge (Bee) it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, the subject of the British Minister's requisition," &c. He having therefore been asked for papers relative to Jonathan Robbins expressed his willingness by furnishing what he supposed was intended.

Mr. O. said he did not know to what points the evidence required by the gentleman from New York could apply, except it was to that of his being an American citizen, and of his being impressed. An affidavit was produced to prove these facts, but it would be found from an examination of the documents that nothing relating to those points was in the office of the Department of State; for the date of the affidavit of Robbins is the 25th of July, but the order of the Secretary of State, bears date the 5th of June, so that no papers as to his claim can be in the possession of that Department. Mr. O. thought the documents before the House contained everything that was important to the point.

Admitting the position gentlemen had taken to be true, which he positively denied, but admitting that the President had given an opinion upon a judicial question, it was only as respected the delivering up of the man, which was only in fact an Executive duty; but if the evidence should prove insufficient to support the charge exhibited against the Executive or Judge, he was certain that the gentleman from New York would rejoice as much as himself to find the charges unfounded, and the character of those gentlemen beyond blame.

Mr. CRAIK was sorry that gentlemen who advocated this motion should be charged with an opposition to the Administration of Government, he believed his conduct had heretofore evinced a different line of conduct. He still denied that the mode taken by the resolution could lead to impeachment. It certainly did contain a very great censure, and one which the House had no authority to inflict.

Gentlemen had supported their resolution upon the ground of the necessity of the various departments of the Government being kept distinct, but the very object of the resolution was a dereliction of that principle, since it exemplified an interference on the part of the House with a Judge of the United States, and with the Executive of the United States. When the House undertook to decide upon Executive or Judicial acts, and call their conduct into review, before them, not with a view to impeach but to give a severe censure, they certainly interfered with the separate powers of those departments, which in his opinion was setting a very dangerous precedent. He thought it ought not to be in the power of any member to lay such a resolution on the table, or, if it was laid there, that it ought not to be discussed, unless it was found to contain principles over which the House had power. It should not be in the power of any member to call the attention of the House to what could not have any good effect, but might have a very dangerous one. The power of impeachment by the Constitution was not a power to inflict punishment, it was only a power to investigate facts to be tried by another tribunal; the House were not to judge, they were only to charge, but by this proceeding they had taken upon them to consider of the propriety of punishing as well as charging; for most assuredly to censure, to injure a man's character, must operate as a punishment.

Mr. GALLATIN considered the motion to be grounded on two ideas; that there was not sufficient foundation for the House to act upon, and therefore that it was necessary to discharge the committee, or postpone the subject for want of further evidence.

It is clear, said Mr. G., that the evidence is not sufficient to impeach the District Judge of South Carolina. If an impeachment of him was the object, it would be impossible to carry it forward without an authoritative copy of the record of the court; but if there was no intention to impeach, he did not think there was any material evidence wanted in order to decide upon the resolution, since it only meant an implication of censure upon the Executive and the District Judge, and not impeachment.

The only business being to consider of the propriety or impropriety of censuring or approving the conduct of the President and the Judge, all the material facts were before the House. If any censure was due to the President, it was on account of the opinion and advice he expressed by his letter to Judge Bee. This letter was before the House, and nothing more could be wanted to form the resolution upon; the fact was sufficient to form a decision upon. There could be but one thing wanting, and that was the original letter of the President to the Secretary of State, instructing him what to write to Judge Bee, and this could not be requisite if gentlemen would not say the letter of the Secretary perhaps did not contain the precise opinion of the President. If there should be such an objection, he should certainly wish the House to possess the document. However, he concluded that no such objection could be, since the Message of the President contained a full acknowledgment of every sentiment contained in that letter.

Mr. G. agreed there was at first sight some weight in the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. CRAIK,) that the House had only a power to impeach but not to censure; but certainly, when it was considered that an act might be committed without any ill motive, and yet the act be injurious, it could not be the subject of impeachment, but it might be of censure. The same act committed with a criminal motive would be impeachable, which without it would be of a nature not to admit of it.

Again: Mr. G. thought that though the House might have ground whereupon to censure, they ought not, at any time; but they had exercised that power. They had in a number of cases approved of the conduct of the President, and if the act of approbation had been done, they surely had as much power to disapprove and censure.

As to the irritation that was apprehended from a continuation of the discussion, that consideration would not induce him, Mr. G. said, to vote with the gentleman from Kentucky. If there was any irritation to be apprehended, it must come from those gentlemen who denominated themselves exclusive friends of the Administration; from those who presumed to arraign all the measures of their opponents, and who declared that they were disposed to support, not only that measure, but every measure of the Administration.

A number of very improper epithets had been thrown out as it respected the resolution, and certainly the distinction must be considered very narrow between those resolutions and the supporters of them; but it was too frequent for those great supporters of the Administration to use high tones, and if they choose to do so, let them. Mr. G. said he was not afraid of any injury accruing from the high ground they had assumed to themselves.

The question was then taken on the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration, and negatived—yeas 14, nays 76, as follows:

INTERCOURSE WITH FRANCE.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had agreed to the bill further to suspend the commercial intercourse with France, with sundry amendments.

The bill was taken up, when Mr. MACON moved that the consideration of the amendments be postponed until the first Monday in December next. He observed that this bill, in the shape it passed the Senate, was so fatal to the interests of the Southern States that, every opportunity he could meet with, his duty impelled him to take measures for its destruction.

The motion was negatived.

The first amendment proposed by the Senate was to strike out a permission granted in the bill to citizens of the United States now residing in the French Republic, to enter with vessels and property, bona fide theirs, into any port of the United States, previous to the first of October next.

After the question was stated and put to concur with this amendment, Mr. LIVINGSTON was perceived to be on the floor. The SPEAKER decided that he had risen too late to offer his sentiments; however, by universal concurrence, he proceeded to state some objections to the amendment, and was answered by Mr. ORIS, when the question for concurrence was put and carried—yeas 50, nays 36.

The second amendment was to strike out the tenth section, in the words following:

“In case the President of the United States shall deem it necessary to employ a Consul, or other agent, to repair to and reside at any place within the territories of the French Republic, or any of the dependencies thereof, with which he may deem it expedient, or may contemplate to renew a commercial intercourse, pursuant to the fifth section of this act, then such Consul or other agent shall and may be allowed an annual salary not exceeding $3,000, and shall be prohibited and wholly restrained from engaging directly or indirectly in any commerce or traffic whatever, during his continuance in office.”

This question caused some debate, but it was at length carried that the section should be struck out.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 27.

Another member, to wit: JOHN SMITH, from New York, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. DAVIS said, as the House had yesterday thought proper to negative a proposition to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the farther consideration of the business, and as one great motive for that motion was the incompetency of evidence before the House, and as he knew it was in the power of the House to procure that evidence by a proper application, he hoped gentlemen would now indulge him in the adoption of the following, which he moved, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House a copy of the proceedings of the court held in the district of South Carolina, in the case of Thomas Nash, calling himself Jonathan Robbins.

Mr. BAYARD said, if he was persuaded, or if the gentleman could convince him that there was any particular evidence in the hands of any officer that would tend to throw such light as to give the least explanation to the case, he certainly would be willing to accord with the resolution; but he believed every necessary fact was before the House, and this had been acknowledged by several gentlemen. If the object was to prove that Nash was an American citizen, and that he was impressed, that could not be necessary as it respected the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, for that gentleman himself had acknowledged that he believed no such thing, but that the whole claim was falsehood. Would the gentleman, then, inform the House what point he wished to ascertain, or in what he expected additional proof? He wished information, farther, who was the "proper officer" to whom reference was expected to be made. There are but two officers at all in view, one is the Secretary of State, the other the District Judge of South Carolina; the gentleman could not suppose that the Judge would be able to transmit the records of that court previous to the adjournment of the House; and if it could be obtained, no evidence to the point could be expected from him. If, on the other hand, it was meant to call on the Secretary of State, it was not to be expected, from the nature of the case, that any more documents were in his hands than those already furnished; he had given copies of the correspondence and requisition, which it might be fairly inferred, from the nature of his office, was all of which he could be possessed. But if any gentleman doubted this fact, he could apply to the office of the Secretary of State, from whom he could procure whatever was in his possession.

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

FEBRUARY, 1800.

If it was the intention of the House to close this very disagreeable business in the present session, they must negative the resolution and let the discussion go forward. The gentleman who brought forward the resolution ought to have been provided with every document that was necessary to support the charges, before he suffered them to appear. However, he did not think but the gentleman who proposed the resolutions thought his grounds were quite sufficient to support them.

Mr. S. SMITH, was in favor of the resolution. He considered himself as filling the character of judge of the case, and as such he was inclined to think, from the documents which were laid before the House, that there was other papers, which were not yet brought forward, relative to the judicial proceedings of South Carolina, that would have a considerable effect on his vote. He said there was a paper which he had seen published which ought, in his opinion, to be in the possession of the House; he meant that wherein Jonathan Robbins swore he was an American citizen, and as a proof of it produced before the court a notarial certificate of New York, the date of which went to corroborate the fact. He also swore he was impressed. If this certificate was before the House, gentlemen would be able to compare the date of it with the declaration made by Admiral Parker, and perhaps that comparison might produce conviction some way or other. These he thought very important, if it was desirous to prove the man an American citizen. This was certainly the duty of the Judge to ascertain, but it did not appear whether he paid attention to it, or not; however it was very presumable that he did not. Mr. S. declared he should be at a loss to go forward in the business without these papers, if he was to decide upon the whole truth.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he always believed that the testimony was incomplete, but when he heard a gentleman get up and mention particular testimony which he considered so important that without it he should not know how to vote, whatever Mr. N. said might have been his former satisfaction as to the establishment of the points, he certainly must now be inclined to grant gentlemen every point of evidence that they should think necessary, if within the reach of the House.

One particular piece of testimony had been mentioned, viz: that the man had filed an affidavit that he was an American citizen and was impressed on board a British man-of-war. Could any gentleman pretend to say that no inference might be drawn from this source and the concomitant facts? The gentleman from New York, to be sure, had declared his satisfaction with the facts that had been produced to the House, but did the gentleman from Delaware know that this was the case with any other gentleman in the House? That gentleman's conclusions and impressions were not to be taken as the opinions of others, nor were others obliged to be satisfied because he was; and therefore to couple others in a measure to which they were not privy, and to ascribe opinions to them which they had not expressed, was at least unfair.

Some gentlemen might feel satisfied with what had came out since this unfortunate man's death, but that could be no rule for others. As to this part of the papers, Mr. N. could by no means understand or conceive for what they were collected and sent to the House—except, indeed, it was to quiet the minds of some gentlemen who thought that the measures of the Government were too precipitate, in their having judged the case without proof. That certificates should be collected respecting this man after his death, and when he could not possibly appear to contradict them, or to adduce contrary evidence, was an insult to the common understanding. Suppose this man had claimed to be an American citizen, and the Government had known it, he would ask gentlemen how they would justify an act done when no such evidence was known to exist as was now presented from Connecticut? What does it amount to, but that there is a chasm in this business which wants to be supplied? It might be supplied to the satisfaction of some gentlemen, Mr. N. said, but it was by no means so to his. Suppose, as was observed before, the certificates had proved the man to be an American, what could gentlemen have then said? From the present state of information, every gentleman must acknowledge it a matter of doubt, and being so, it ought to have been searched into; this doubt might probably be removed by a reference to the Judge; but the record of the court would prove another thing, and one which the gentleman who moved the resolutions expressed his intention to dwell much upon, that is, whether the Judge had caused him to be arrested, and intended him for trial in the Circuit Court of the United States; and whether the Judge had taken upon him to supersede, not his own jurisdiction, but that of the court over which he presided, in the delivery of this man to the British agent. For his part, Mr. N. said, he had no doubt of the jurisdiction of the United States upon this man's trial, and that it was a departure from justice to deliver him up to a foreign tribunal.

Upon a review of these reasons, he must conclude that more evidence ought to be had, if more evidence could enable the House to make a better investigation, and more was attainable; for, although the gentleman from New York thought the business ripe for discussion, he could not say it was, and therefore thought it his duty to vote for the motion.

Mr. OTIS said, he should not, for himself, have the smallest hesitation, if that resolution pointed to a particular object, or to a particular officer, who might be under the direction of the President, to agree to it. If the gentleman would modify his motion, so that the President of the United States might be requested to instruct the Secretary of State, to lay before the House those papers, he should not vote against it. But he thought it his duty to declare that the Secretary of State had received no further authentic or other transcript than he had furnished to the House, of the judicial proceedings on this subject. Mr. O. said he had received this information from the Secretary of State in answer to an inquiry of that officer, whether he had any such documents. But in the present form of the resolution he could not agree to it. If the motion was adopted, the question would be, who was the "proper officer?" Even if it was to be some officer under the direction of the President, the President had already furnished the House with every paper within his power. If the "proper officer" meant, was the Judge of South Carolina, Mr. O. would say, that the Executive could not with propriety furnish it, because it would be to all intents an interference with the Judiciary department. He did not think that the President had any right to demand the documents of that court. He thought the House were fully competent to send to that District Judge, ordering him to lay before them all the papers they should think necessary; but then the question would be, were the House ready to consent that the proceeding should be postponed until such an application should be made, or, in short, till the conclusion of the session? Besides, to ask for documents which would be made use of injuriously both to the Executive and to the Judge, was a measure which gentlemen who supported the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, could have no right to expect from gentlemen who could perceive nothing improper in their conduct.

If then it be true, of which Mr. O. thought there could be but little doubt, that the judicial proceedings of that court were never before the Executive, whether the Judge had done wrong or not, he, and he only, would have to answer, and not the President. The conduct of the President grew out of the proceedings of the court; where then could be the propriety or justice of hanging up the President in effigy, and there suspend him until the next session of Congress, subject to the thousand alarms, surmises, and reproaches of the people, which must carry with it the whole object of the censure? Every man might have had access to those papers; the Judge never would have refused any man a copy of all the proceedings that might tend to elucidate a subject which they may think was deficient without it. An honorable gentleman had lately written a pamphlet on the subject; he might have procured the proceedings of that court, if he had thought them of any service, and so might the gentleman from New York. Should, then, the proceedings on this business be suspended merely for the want of evidence, which it was in the power of every gentleman to have brought forward? Gentlemen had, with very great deliberation, brought forward this accusation before the House. If it was in the power of every gentleman to refer to new evidence at every stage of the business, after the accusation was grounded only on the documents before the House, the evident effect must be to procrastinate beyond all bounds a business which the honor of our Government requires should be immediately decided. In justice therefore to the President, he conceived himself bound to vote against the resolution.

Mr. DANA thought this a most extraordinary resolution indeed. Was the President of the United States the clerk of the court, to keep the records of it? What had the President to do with the proceedings of that court? It was certainly a total departure from all the forms of judicial proceedings to suppose a thing of the kind. The gentlemen must certainly have mistaken the situation held by the President, or they would never have made such a vast departure from order and propriety of proceeding. The President is not the public accuser; he is not to be called upon for papers with which he has nothing to do. When he found gentlemen outraging everything that belonged to judicial propriety; when he found them stumbling into error after error, and departing totally from all jurisprudential propriety, Mr. D. said, he could not avoid rising to oppose it.

So much for the form; he believed it totally wrong, and therefore could not be adopted. But, in addition to this, the House would render themselves more ridiculous than they now appeared, by the adoption of measures which must make a matter appear important, that in itself was unimportant. Several gentlemen proceeded with the same zeal as though an American citizen was concerned. This was not the case; it was notorious to every man that this Nash was a foreigner; of this the House was fully apprized by respectable testimony. This man contended that he was born in Danbury, but the certificate of the clerk who kept the registers for a number of years back, to whom the annual list of all the births was transmitted, and by him registered, and also the certificates of a number of old residents in that town, had incontestably proved that this man was never an inhabitant of that town. He was an Irishman. Let any man from Ireland whatever declare that he is an American of Connecticut, in vain would he try to impose that opinion upon the mind of any person who observes his speech; it is entirely impossible to suppose that an intelligent court could be so imposed upon. The fact of country being incontestably proved, how can gentlemen be so earnest, in the face of that fact, to charge the Executive with any improper influence? Could the gentleman be ignorant how many men who were aliens had taken advantage of the certificates granted to Americans, and as Americans had procured certificates from a magistrate in attestation of their false oaths? Any gentleman who believed that possible might account for his having procured an American certificate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he did hope that this motion would not have been brought forward; but as he meant to vote in favor of it, after having declared his satisfaction with the documents, as sufficient to support his resolutions, he should be accused of advocating a question of which he had before spoken apparently differently, unless he should now give his reasons; and lest he should be accused of a desire to keep alive a calumny against the President of the United States, an effect which had been stated, he took opportunity to answer the insinuation by saying that he as much abhorred so mean a principle as any gentleman in the House.

Mr. L. said he would again declare that the evidence was sufficient to satisfy his mind upon the points he meant to establish, but that should not preclude other gentlemen from thinking other papers necessary—papers which he must acknowledge would throw an additional light on the subject. Though he thought the Message contained all the facts absolutely necessary to establish the points he proposed to dwell on, yet it certainly did not contain all that was asked for, and which it was in the power of the President to give; and yet, on the other hand, more was sent than was asked for, and what they had no right to send was given.

The resolution, Mr. L. said, asked for all the papers relative to the apprehension and delivery. A copy of the requisition and of the correspondence was furnished, but where are the other papers relative to the delivery of Jonathan Robbins? We are told that they are not in the office of the Secretary of State; the President must know where they can be procured, and he has it in his power to procure them; they may be in the hands of the District Judge of South Carolina. But the House are told the President cannot procure this record: gentlemen say he has no power over that department; and yet this very President has the power to instruct this very District Judge to deliver up the person to the British Government! How then can gentlemen presume to say the President has not power to call for the records of the court in a case in which himself has acted a principal part?

Again: it was said that neither the President nor the Judge had a right to deliver up papers that might lead to their crimination. This was the reason why the House should require papers that would explain any doubtful parts of their conduct; for this very reason the House ought to demand, not only the documents, but the reasons for their conduct. The President or the Judge can only be able to supply the House with those documents, and if they have done wrong they ought to be required to furnish them.

But gentlemen, supposing the main reason for inquiring is to ascertain whether Nash was an American or not, said that the inquiry to this point was extremely unimportant whether he was or was not. Upon that, Mr. L. said, he did not lay so much stress as some other gentlemen; he believed it was perfectly immaterial, because he believed that the course of the proceeding would be precisely the same whether he was or was not, and because it appeared that the conduct of the Executive and of the Judge would have been the same in either event. The same might be said as to the impressment. And therefore, though some trouble had been taken to prove that, in addition to the murder, he had been guilty of perjury—he being proved to the satisfaction of some gentlemen to be an Irishman—it was precisely the same in the case. However it had been, he should have been delivered up.

Gentlemen had farther said that he, Mr. L. ought to have known all these facts before he had formed the resolutions. Mr. L. said he did not think so; as he had before declared, he was possessed of satisfactory facts, but he could not prevent himself giving loose to the desires which other gentlemen had expressed, and therefore should now accord with them in the vote.

Mr. MARSHALL said, it was with no inconsiderable regret that he perceived so much of the time of the House, which ought to be devoted to more beneficial purposes, employed in preliminary discussion. He thought that it was impossible the House could agree to a postponement, which the motion under consideration must cause when it was reflected how much time must be employed in procuring those papers—it could not take less than a month; for they could only be found, he would presume to say, in the Court of the District of South Carolina: it was therefore scarcely to be expected that they could be obtained until just before the rising of the House, a period, if they arrived before the House rose, too late for their consideration.

He therefore considered the question precisely the same in principle, though different in form, to that which yesterday occupied the House. The question he believed essentially to be, would the House postpone the business till the next session? in this light he should treat it; and he could not see how gentlemen who voted against the motion yesterday could advocate the present. Shall the House, merely because two or three members think such documents are necessary, agree to postpone the business? for if two or three members be indulged on this account, two or three may lay claim to the same right on another account, and thus day after day may be spent and no determination ever be come to! It is a necessary case in every House, and upon every question; there always will be some few found who will express dissatisfaction at proceedings, and claim some privilege, but this can never operate as a general rule for a session. Gentlemen ought not to request this when the general expression of the case is, that there is enough evidence before the House to decide on the resolutions. And most particularly it ought not to be indulged in a case where so much manifest mischief would attend its inevitable consequence, delay. Let gentlemen recollect the nature of the case: the President of the United States is charged by this House with having violated the Constitution and laws of his country, by having committed an act of dangerous interference with a judicial decision—he is so charged by a member of this House. Gentlemen were well aware how much the public safety and happiness depended on a well or a misplaced confidence in the Executive. Was it reasonable or right, Mr. M. asked, to receive this charge—to receive in part the evidence in support of it—to receive so much evidence as almost every gentleman declared himself satisfied with, and to leave the charge unexamined, hanging over the head of the President of the United States, until a distance of time, how long it was impossible to say, but certainly long enough to work a very bad effect? To him it seemed of all things the most unreasonable and unjust; and the mischief resulting therefrom must be very great indeed.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

When the evidence, now in possession of the House, came to be examined, gentlemen would be much better able to decide whether more would be necessary, than they possibly could be at present; if more should then be wanted, the business might with propriety be postponed. If it was possible to obtain the documents shortly, he should have no hesitation to admit of the motion, but, being impossible, he felt no hesitation in declaring he should put his negative on it.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) Mr. M. said, in his opinion, had criminated the conduct of the Secretary of State, in supposing that he had withheld some of the documents. The court record was mentioned—but was it to be supposed by the Executive that he was to be called upon to furnish papers the property of another department of the Government, supposing them material? To procure these papers, he knew was as much in the power of the House as in his power. The House could as well despatch a messenger as the Executive could. How was the President, then, to consider those papers asked for of him? Was he to be a menial to the House in a business wherein himself was seriously charged? Certainly not. There could be no doubt but the Executive thought he had fully complied with the request of the House, when he supplied them with those immediately in his power.

Mr. BAYARD said he could not distinguish between the present motion and one yesterday negative, because it must operate as a discharge upon the Committee of the whole House. There could be no doubt but the Secretary of State had furnished all the papers relative to the business in his possession—indeed, he could assuredly say so. He said he held in his hand a letter from the Secretary of State, in answer to one from an honorable member of the House inquiring whether there were any more documents in his office; he answered that he had no certified copy whatever but those which he had furnished the President with, from whom they came to the House. Gentlemen must then perceive that the mere operation of this resolution was an absolute and inevitable postponement of the business till another session. Many gentlemen, who were yesterday ashamed to vote for a postponement, would now have a plausible cover for their vote by calling for additional proof, to accomplish the object of the resolution of yesterday; and thus he feared it would have many advocates, but, however specious the pretext, he hoped it would not be carried.

Mr. B. then went into an examination of the facts contained in the resolutions of Mr. LIVINGSTON, from which he deduced the impossibility of procuring anything that could be material in the prosecution of their discussion, or that could assist the House in drawing their conclusions, except any new facts could be produced, and, therefore, he concluded that nothing but a postponement could be the issue. He farther contended, in answer to Mr. NICHOLAS, that it was not competent for the Executive to furnish papers the property of the District Judge; as well might the House ask for the Executive to bring the proceedings on again at their bar. In the impeachment of Blount, Mr. B. said, the House did not apply to the President, but appointed a committee to bring the case and all the papers relative to it to view; so it might have been in the present case.

And by what authority, taking the subject in another view, could the House call upon that Judge to furnish it with papers? The Executive had no right to demand them of him, nor had the House. The power of the Judiciary is co-ordinate with the power of this House; it is a distinct branch of the Government. He would have precisely the same right to call authoritatively for a copy of the Journals of this House, as the House would to call upon him for copies of his record; his proceedings are public, his records are open to view, so are our Journals; we cannot call upon him for them, though we may obtain them by paying the clerk for a copy of them, as any individual might do.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had considered the notarial certificate of New York, in attestation of Nash's or Robbins's citizenship, to be important. If that gentleman thought this a material document, Mr. B. said he did not; but he thought the observation very material, as it might make an improper impression on the minds of some gentlemen. What could be more easy than for this Thomas Nash, this perjured pirate and murderer, to have got a certificate, when he murdered some man, or he might have procured it by purchase or favor. But there were facts before the House that this man was an Irishman, that his name was Nash and not Robbins; that it was never issued to him, and that he was never entitled to it. What farther then can be wanted? Will not this satisfy gentlemen? The next thing, if this objection be admitted, we shall be called upon to send to the West Indies to prove the fact that his name was Nash!

Mr. B. said he was well satisfied that when this subject came to be analyzed, it would be made to appear perfectly clear that the whole of the evidence necessary was before the House, and it would only be misspending time and producing extremely injurious consequences to grant the motion.

Mr. RUTLEDGE conceived this motion to be the same as to postpone the business. Further information was wanted, and that information could alone come from South Carolina. He wished the gentleman from Kentucky would read the resolution before he pressed his motion: he would find that the District Judge was not charged; no, it was only a charge against the Executive; there was not a word of irregularity of proceeding in the Court, but the Executive was seriously charged.

Mr. DAVIS explained. He said his objects were to have the record in order to see whether Robbins did produce a certificate that he was an American citizen; to see a copy of the warrant by which he was committed; and thirdly, to know what stratagem or what proceedings were used to take him out of the cognizance of the Court, where he must have remained, if the President had not interfered. These things he wished to ascertain, but that would be impossible without the court record.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said, he conceived this to be the object, but he by no means thought that the gentleman would be satisfied on these points, were he to be possessed of the record. The gentleman might inquire the reasons for the Executive and Judicial conduct being as it was, but perhaps he would not receive the information. Every gentleman in the House would unite their vote to procure all the testimony within their reach, so as to enable the House to prosecute the business. We know, said Mr. R., what monstrous clamor has been raised about this business; we know that great pains have been taken to make the people believe that their fellow-citizen has been torn from his country; that he has been impressed into a foreign service; that the treaty has been violated; that their fellow-citizen has been taken to a foreign country, and there been tried in a summary manner and executed. We have been told for months past that this business would be inquired into; we wish not to avoid it; we will by all means in our power assist it; we have done it. Some time since papers were asked for, we agreed with gentlemen that they should be furnished; it was done, and they are now on your table. They have been there many days; so that gentlemen had sufficient time, long before this, to have known whether they were satisfied or not. The gentleman himself who brought forward the resolutions affected to be satisfied, but, in compliance with the wish of his friends, he now wishes to postpone it. We want to bring the matter to a decision, and so far as we can accommodate gentlemen and avoid delay we will do it.

But, said Mr. R., what will be the effect of this motion? Sir, it will hold up to the view of the world the President of the United States, as having been grossly delinquent in his duty. We say, if he has offended, punish him; if he has not, discharge him from censure; but by no means expose him to popular suspicion, without an examination.

What more can be wanted than the House are in possession of? The Secretary of State says he has no further documents; and he cannot be suspected of any design to smother the business, by the readiness with which the call of the House was complied with. He might have said he would send to the district of South Carolina, but instead of that, so earnest was he to give every possible information, that he trusted to newspaper publications, and this he tells you is all he has. What more can be asked? After a discussion, if the evidence should be found insufficient, and more light was necessary on which to form a decision, Mr. R. then would agree to send anywhere for evidence; but until he was convinced of a want of such testimony, except the will of gentlemen could be complied with without delay, he should be compelled to vote against the motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON rose to correct what he considered a mistake in the gentleman last up, (Mr. RUTLEDGE,) when he said that the Executive only was implicated in the resolutions; he conceived that the District Judge of South Carolina was implicated, and that the papers of that court were necessary to examine the conduct of that Judge. He read the resolution, and contended that his deduction was accurate. Mr. N. said he wanted to know whether the District Judge of South Carolina had committed this man for trial; this would appear or be disproved by the warrant.

Mr. N. said, he could not believe the position laid down by a gentleman, (Mr. DANA,) that it was utterly impossible that Jonathan Robbins should have been a citizen of the United States. It was worthy of notice that the notarial certificate, which the unfortunate man produced in court, was dated 1795; the opposite authority, to wit, a copy of the books of the Hermione, appeared to state that Thomas Nash was transferred to that ship in 1792. He wanted to know, authoritatively, whether this certificate was produced to the court, for, if it was produced, it certainly went to prove that the copy of the books of the Hermione was erroneous, because, if this man was in New York in 1795, he could not have been on board British frigate in 1792, and have continued there until the time of the mutiny.

That the President of the United States was not to be considered as the servant of that House, he was willing to admit, but he did think that the President might, with propriety, apply to the Judge of the district for the documents of the court; and he did not believe that the President would object to make the application. However, the object he presumed was to procure the papers, no matter from whom; that being the object, he hoped the mover of the resolution would withdraw it, in order to accommodate it more to the feelings of some members in the House, by adopting something like the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be requested to procure, from the Clerk of the District Court of South Carolina, copies, under seal, of the proceedings of that court, together with the evidence produced in the case relative to the requisition for Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins, who was delivered to His Britannic Majesty's Consul.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

Mr. DAVIS withdrew his resolution, and Mr. NICHOLAS moved the substitute, which was now before the House.

Mr. HARPER moved a postponement of this resolution to this day week. The object of the resolution which was before the Committee of the Whole was two-fold—a charge on the President, and a charge on the District Judge. So much as related to the President of the United States, it was manifest that the testimony called for by this resolution could have no effect whatever upon him, because he left the whole to the Judge. The President went no further than to declare that if it should appear that the acts committed by this man came within the purview of the British Treaty, the man ought to be delivered up conformably to that stipulation.

It must be manifest that the testimony to be expected from South Carolina could have no possible effect on the part relating to the President, and, therefore, the House could proceed with that part of the resolution; but whether the Judge, in executing the duty belonging to him, acted with propriety or not, might be more clear from the documents of that court. When the Judge entered into the consideration of this subject, what questions were open to him? The principle was, whether the man was guilty of the piracy and murder charged to him or not; if this was proved, no further question could arise as to the propriety of delivering him up conformably to the requisition.

The consequence of these papers being called for, had been stated to be much delay; it would operate so. Was it not an established principle, Mr. H. asked, that a delay of justice amounted to a denial of justice. If you suffer this charge to hang over the head of your President for eight months, to no purpose, you inflict a severe punishment. A charge is here exhibited against the First Magistrate of the Union, which must be considered as the commencement of an impeachment; for, if gentlemen have any propriety of conduct, this must operate as a foundation to impeachment. This is to keep alive the idea of guilt—to hang up suspicion, as a party weapon, over the head of the Executive, until an opportunity shall offer to make use of it on a great approaching occasion; this, he thought was the main intention of the motion, and this consequence was inevitable. He believed the motion now before the House to be the same in principle as one yesterday negatived; it was an effort to shrink from a charge, the object of which could better be answered by delay than examination.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought, with the gentleman last up, that if the only inquiry was as to the conduct of the President, or if the inquiry was only to respect the Judge, the papers might be dispensed with; but it was otherwise—the conduct of both was called forth to view by the resolutions, but how far the conduct of either may be reprehensible, depended on the testimony which might appear before the House. It was impossible to say what the President had done until the documents should be seen. If gentlemen refused the inquiry being made of the court in South Carolina, they, by that act, made the President answerable for every part of the facts, which he believed they would not pretend to do. He really believed it extremely important to know what steps had been taken in this very serious business, to know whether the man was in course for trial, and whether the President had acted in the hasty and premature manner which was stated, in delivering him up.

Mr. N. then proceeded to prove that the warrant was important to be seen, because the intent for which the apprehension was made, was explicitly incumbent on the Judge to record, together with the court where he was to be tried, agreeably to the provisions of the Judiciary act, and, therefore, this information could be attained by recurring to that record. A gentleman had thought the information could not be obtained from persons whom probably that information may criminate. But were the House to decide upon information short of truth, because the result may lead to crimination? That is, they are to be acquitted without materials whereupon to acquit. As to the objection of gentlemen on account of the time it would take to procure the testimony, which they suppose would be so late that the case could not be acted upon during the present session, he believed it was not accurate. Mr. N. declared that it was far from his desire to postpone the subject; he wished it to go forward without delay, but not without all the facts before the House which were necessary.

The House were told by a gentleman (Mr. MARSHALL) that it would be extremely improper to indulge a few gentlemen in their objections. Was the gentleman confident that there would be a majority of his opinion? A few, it must be remembered, could make a decision, and, if so, the result of the opinion of those few might guide the question. Much had been said about the introduction of the motion, and the motives ascribed to the supporters of it, as though it was a planned object. Mr. N. denied having the least knowledge of it till the motion was made, and, with respect to him, it could not be thought an attempt to carry into effect the motion yesterday made for postponement, because he yesterday voted against that motion, and by no means could agree to postpone, but for an object which he now thought material—when the object was to obtain important information; and believing, as he did, that it would not put off the decision beyond the power of the present session, he should consider himself justified in voting for the motion.

Mr. GALLATIN could not help observing the disposition which gentlemen evinced of placing the opinions and sensations expressed by one gentleman to the account of others. To take a fair view of the resolutions, what did they amount to? Nothing more than the deductions which one man had drawn from the Message sent to this House by the Executive: these deductions, in the form of a resolution, he had submitted to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. Now, except it could be proved that that gentleman had made all the deductions of and acted for every gentleman, there could be no ground for saying that every gentleman would be satisfied, without the evidence which might be collected from the records of the District Court of South Carolina. Was any gentleman in the House bound to be satisfied, with the gentleman from New York, that all the facts necessary to be known were furnished? Was every gentleman in the House bound to confine himself solely to the resolutions before the House? Certainly not. It could not be denied that the evidence now required was essential to a full investigation of the conduct of the Judge, who was the principal agent of the Executive in this case.

He did not consider the question to be whether the resolution of the gentleman from New York required that evidence or not to support them, but whether, to come to a knowledge of the truth and the whole truth relative to the circumstance, it was not necessary. Although, Mr. G. observed, he could not at present perceive how far it was likely those documents might assist the decision of the House, yet he thought them proper to come before the House; it was very probable they would tend either to criminate more, or to extenuate, and perhaps to justify.

With respect to the objection, on the ground of postponement, Mr. G. would observe that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina proved that this was not the proper time to proceed in the discussion; the motion implied that gentleman's acknowledgment of it, or he would rather have at once rejected the motion than moved its postponement for a week; he therefore presumed that gentleman saw the additional testimony necessary.

[Mr. HARPER explained his statement to be that the testimony to be expected, nor the postponement, could have any possible bearing on the part relating to the President, and therefore that ought to be decided; but, as far as related to the Judge, evidence might be necessary.]

Taking this to be the mind of the gentleman, Mr. G. said, he did not know in what manner he could apply his argument to the motion. For himself, he was ready to vote on the resolutions without more documents, but as other gentlemen were not, he should vote without them. He confessed he was the more earnest to do this, because, on the very threshold of the business, the gentleman was stopped while reading a paper he thought useful to bring forward. Gentlemen had now gotten up and declared themselves compelled to call for evidence which might substantiate a fact contained in that paper, which, though known to be true, was not stamped with that legal credit that was necessary. Let gentlemen then come forward at once and give this fact its legal importance, or prove its non-existence.

Another fact stated, was, that the President had undertaken to discharge the man when the court had already assumed jurisdiction of the case. This it was possible to prove or disprove by the record of the court. That this record, agreeably to law, was to contain the name of the court before which the case was triable, and process upon which the man was arrested, he quoted the Judiciary act, Laws U. S., vol. 1, pages 72, 73. He was, however, well satisfied, from the letter of the Judge and the nature of the case, that this man was committed for trial before a court of the United States, and what corroborated the opinion was that no power was given by our laws to hold a man in prison on any other ground. On the whole, Mr. G. said, as one fact had been and others might be contended, if produced, it would perhaps be the most expeditious, as it certainly would be the most satisfactory, method, to procure every fact authentically attested, before the proceeding was had.

Mr. H. LEE hoped that the gentleman from South Carolina would withdraw his motion. He would mention some reasons which would induce him to vote differently from gentlemen with whom he usually had the honor to vote. Considering this a question of very great importance, not only to the American people, and to the reputation of the House, but also to the highly respectable character presiding over our Government, he trusted the House would, in its whole process, be led by principles so fair and candid, as not to leave the least room for a charge of derogation from its own dignity or of the great subject it was discussing.

He would vote for the motion calling for the papers, but he would do it with an expectation that it would not postpone the discussion of the business so far as related to the conduct of the President of the United States. It appeared that the conduct of the President, as charged, was fully before the House; there could be no difficulty therefore to proceed on it; but, as far as respected the Judge, Mr. L. trusted the record of the court would be sent, for he thought it but fair to gratify gentlemen who considered there was any material evidence wanting.

If the view of the gentleman was to postpone the whole of this business, until a return from South Carolina, he would ask the gentleman from New York and his friends, whether they could wish any means to be adopted more completely to effect the object of the resolutions than postponement? Was I the high character, said Mr. L., to whom this resolution refers, I would infinitely rather have the disapprobation of this House to the full extent which the censure goes, than to have the subject postponed, and be exposed to the conclusions and surmises of the world. I will not attribute the motives to gentlemen which the gentleman from South Carolina has expressed; I cannot think the member from New York wishes to suspend the decision of this House until that high character shall be before that tribunal which is to estimate his merits or demerits—for knowing that no baser motives can be cherished, I will not even suspect it of him; but, whatever may be the motives which may induce a postponement, it cannot fail of having that effect. He therefore wished to proceed as it respected the President.

Mr. DANA acknowledged his very high estimate of the opinion of the gentleman last up, but he could not agree with him at present. He did not think it would consist with general justice to delay the case for the time contemplated by the resolution. He well knew that if the inquiry was not made, gentlemen would talk about liberality and about motives; but that he should little regard, being assured that his conduct would be guided by the strictest rules of legal propriety and justice. Mr. D. admitted that much propriety marked the conduct of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON.) That gentleman well knew that the Executive ought not to be called upon, and that the Speaker of the House was the true medium by which evidence could be obtained for that House. But, as the argument was in favor of a complete investigation of the subject, Mr. D. could not help calling to the recollection of gentlemen a motion (which was negatived) to put this previous examination into the hands of a select committee; but, for want of that very necessary measure, gentlemen now found themselves in a disagreeable situation for having accused these officers. They could not prosecute their accusation as they wished, and therefore they would feign make further inquiry. He objected further to it, because it was unnecessary; he did not believe the least good could spring from it. But it was extremely unreasonable, and highly unbecoming the dignified character of grand inquisitors general, because there was no proof to make the charge appear, that they should suspend the business while gentlemen sought for proof which they ought to have known when the resolutions were proposed. They ought by no means to have been brought upon slight grounds. Did the gentleman not know that public officers possessed reputation, and that the preservation of that reputation was essential to preserve public confidence in them? He would not stretch a man on the bed of torture, for time unknown, while he searched for proof of a supposed crime. Sir, said Mr. D., by this treatment you chain your public officers to a rock for this spirit of patriotism, like a vulture, to prey on their hearts. This is conduct I abhor, and therefore cannot, for my part, indulge in it.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

Sir, they have brought this charge; we are willing to meet it; we are willing to give full weight to it. We are not disposed to vindicate the Executive, nor any other public officer, if doing wrong; but it is because we respect honest men, in public stations, that we are prepared to hear what the tongue of accusation can produce. We are unwilling to leave them exposed to calumny, (as they must be, if unheard and unjustified,) except it be by clamor which a suspicion must inevitably raise.

Mr. VARNUM would vote for the resolution proposed; he thought it was doubtful whether the President had acted with propriety or not; but he believed if there had been any incidental impropriety of conduct, it was never done with an evil design, nor with a view to interfere with any other department of the Government; but certainly to deny this evidence, which several gentlemen had stated to be necessary to assist them in making up their minds, would stamp a censure on the conduct of those officers as great as that contained in the resolution. He thought the gentleman from New York had a right to bring the subject to the view of the House. If he saw any proceeding which to him appeared dangerous, it was his duty to commence an investigation. No man ought to flinch from what he thought right. The only way to give public satisfaction, in a matter that had so much engaged public attention, was to give all the evidence which could be procured, and let the matter be investigated to the bottom; and, most assuredly, the only way effectually to clear the characters implicated, if they were innocent, was to leave no doubt as to the desire of the House to scrutinize their conduct. But, certainly, the very great reluctance which gentlemen showed to procure all the evidence, and, after all, their denial of it, must leave a suspicion bordering much on guilt.

Mr. BAYARD rose, in answer to Mr. GALLATIN and others, and observed, that, with respect to Nash calling himself an American citizen before that court, (an object which it was desired to prove by this call for evidence,) they were asked to admit the fact. Mr. B. asked, would those gentlemen admit that Nash was guilty of the dreadful murders committed on board the British frigate? Would they admit that he falsely made the claim? However, he had no disposition to rest on that point. Another fact, however, which it was required to admit was as to the jurisdiction of the court of the United States upon the case. Mr. B. denied this, and repeated the former arguments in proof of his opinion. He insisted that the whole arrest and proceeding was had at the instance of the British Consul and Minister, in proof of which he quoted their letters. The record, he said, could not possibly dispense any light to this fact; the record would only give the warrant and some of the depositions first taken before the Judge; but as to the court being designated where the case was to be tried, he contended that it was not usual to insert it in the warrant—he never saw one so drawn. It was possible that Nash was committed with a view to be delivered up to the British, before the letter was received by the Judge from the President; and it was very reasonable that the whole previous business was at the instigation of the British agent, but it was impossible to prove that jurisdiction had attached before the letter directing the delivery to be made was received.

Mr. JONES said, that finding himself, from the vote he was about to give, implicated in the charge made by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) that gentlemen who were yesterday ashamed to vote for the proposition to discharge the Committee from further consideration of the subject, in general and express terms, because it would imply a distrust of the sufficiency of the ground on which to support the principles of the resolutions, were now disposed to effect the same object by a decision which would, in fact, go to evade the question during the present session, he felt himself impelled, by a respect for his own conduct, to explain the motives which would govern his vote on the present question. He considered the case which had been called into view by the proposition of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) as one that involved in it the dearest interests and deepest concerns of the people of the United States. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) had indulged themselves in the most violent invectives and unnecessary abuse against the unfortunate, the obscure, and insignificant character, now dead, who was the subject of this proposition. On this topic they had exercised all their powers of passionate declamation. If this was a grateful theme for the employment of their talents, he did not envy them the enjoyment of it. How that kind of argument would apply to the question, he left to the House to determine.

For his part Mr. J. said, he deemed it totally immaterial whether the man was, as they had declared, an Irishman or not; whether he was a Turk, a Hottentot, or a native-born American, if he claimed to be an American citizen, and produced a certificate in due form, under the signature of a proper officer, of his citizenship, and that claim was slighted by the Judge, or declared immaterial, and the fact not inquired into of his being a citizen, then he conceived the safety of the citizens of America, to be equally put in jeopardy, as if the man had been born and raised in Charleston, in the circle of the Judge's own acquaintance. If, he asked, a dagger aimed at my breast by an assassin in the dark, should by mistake or impetuosity pierce the bosom of another, would not the discovery of such an attempt awaken alarm, and demand a precaution for my future safety? Certainly it would. So in this case, if this man claimed to be a citizen and wore about him the legal voucher of that claim, and if he was told in the presence of American citizens, "it is of no importance whether you are, or are not a citizen, that is a point of no concern in the case," notwithstanding it may afterwards be found he was no citizen, yet would it equally involve the safety of every true citizen who might fall into similar circumstances. We may congratulate ourselves that it has not fallen on a fellow-citizen, but we ought still to improve the lesson this case has presented. Mr. J. hoped that it would be improved, and that, at least, legislative provisions would be made to prevent this decision from operating on a citizen, if such a case should occur in future. This man was a citizen to all intents and purposes, so far as respects the precedent, if he claimed that right and produced a voucher to testify it, and was entitled to all the privileges of a citizen until his claim and certificate had been formally proven to be false. Mr. J. said, to ascertain with certainty whether this claim was put in, and how it was treated, it certainly was necessary to procure authentic copies of the record and proceedings in the case, from the court, and every ray of evidence that could be obtained; nothing could be more essential in deciding on the conduct of the Judge than to have an authentic account of the proceedings. Gentlemen seemed extremely anxious to have the question decided early, on account of the censure hanging over the Executive by continuing the business on the table. It is true, said Mr. J., the papers now called for were not necessary to determine on that part of the resolution which charges the Executive with interfering with the Judiciary; on this point no further evidence was wanted, that was an abstract question and might be so decided; but there was a probability that the evidence to be obtained from the courts in Charleston might be material as to another charge or implication against the President. If it should by any means be proved, that the President was informed of, or knew the man had claimed to be a citizen, then he was surely as much to blame in not making the distinction as the Judge; it was possible this might appear from some of the proceedings or papers before the court.

Gentlemen were sensibly affected for the President's feelings in this case, and if he is blameless this tenderness was proper, but for his part he considered the case of the Judge as equally and more delicate than that of the President. The situation of a Judge, determining on the life of his fellow creature, was, he thought, the most important and responsible duty mankind could impose on any one; of course to censure a Judge for any decision that could affect life, was a severe infliction, and in doing it every possible proof and sight ought to be had. It was said that by the delay which this vote would cause, if carried, the President would be hung up in odious effigy to the people at large. Mr. J. said he could not conceive how a disposition of the House to receive every light, and go into as ample an investigation as possible, would have that effect; he believed a contrary conduct would be more likely to render the conduct of the President suspicious and censurable. What effect would a mere vote of approbation have in this case, after refusing to permit testimony to be brought forward which was thought material? It would seem as if the friends of the Executive were afraid to let the matter be clearly sifted, and wished to avoid everything that could throw light on the subject. What value ought to be put on applause obtained in such a way? He believed the President would disdain the approbation of the House on such terms; to make his exculpation grateful to himself and satisfactory to the nation, nothing ought to be suppressed, everything should be produced that related to the subject.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) who is always so tenderly concerned for the character and dignity of this House, and so frequently complains of other gentlemen committing that dignity and respect by their conduct and opinions, has, on all occasions, when he has addressed the House, in his style and manner, manifested the most unlimited confidence in the talents and penetration of one member of the House; but what kind of respect he had discovered for every other gentleman in it, he appealed to the observation of gentlemen generally to determine.

Some gentlemen had indulged themselves in attributing to the mover and friends of this proposition, unworthy motives; he had on many occasions observed that those gentlemen were partial to that kind of debate; he could not see the use or advantage of such conduct; he thought it very unbecoming any gentleman in this body. There was, however, one motive which these gentlemen had not attributed to him or those with whom he usually acted in the House, they could not insinuate nor pretend that their conduct was designed to throw themselves within the benign beams of Executive patronage. Mr. J. said he would not so far conform to a practice which he condemned as to designate what gentlemen would bear an insinuation of that kind, it was not necessary to point them out. He could perceive no other object which could induce gentlemen to declaim so frequently and earnestly on those unpleasant topics.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HARPER, to postpone the consideration of the motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, for a call of the record of the District Court of South Carolina, for one week, and negatived—yeas, 32 nays 63, as follows:

The question then recurred upon adopting the resolutions.

Mr. MARSHALL spoke at length against it. He contended there was no prospect of coming to a decision of the original question this session, if this were adopted; and asked if the character of the President of the United States ought to be held up in the suspicious view in which the resolution placed it, until the next session of Congress? He hoped not. It seemed to him that a postponement amounted to a declaration to the people of America that there was much cause for suspicion, and that additional evidences were wanted to substantiate it.

Mr. NICHOLAS replied to Mr. M., and contended that the whole truth of the case was to come out of the additional testimony now asked for.

An adjournment was then called for, and negatived—yeas 30.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke in favor of the resolution, and in answer to Mr. MARSHALL.

The question was then taken that the House do agree to the motion first proposed, and passed in the negative—yeas 44, nays 57, as follows:

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 28.

Mr. HARPER moved a postponement of the order of the day on the business of Jonathan Robbins, until Monday. He did not conceive much progress would be made this day, and as there was much private business on hand it could not be gone through with. If the business be taken up on Monday it can be regularly gone through with without intermission.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Campbell Smith, which was, that he should receive allowance as Advocate General and Judge Marshal while filling those capacities in the Western Army. The resolution to that effect was agreed to, and the Committee of Claims directed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. WALN presented a memorial from the Health Office in Philadelphia, stating that, in consequence of the plague having raged in Morocco, Great Britain had enacted very strict quarantine laws, but although the port of Philadelphia might be watched by all the vigilance in the power of the Health Office, there was no general law to keep that most dreadful scourge of the human race from being introduced into some ports of the United States. They prayed the attention of Congress thereto.

Referred to the Committee of Commerce.

ADMISSION OF STRANGERS.

The subject of the admission of strangers without the bar, on the floor of the House, was introduced by the SPEAKER. He said it would be very pleasing to him that some specific order should be taken thereupon by the House, since a variety of inconveniences attended the present mode as well as the former.

Mr. DAVIS then moved, that during the present question, (Message of the President, &c.,) the present order relative to the admission of strangers be suspended, and that any persons introduced by members should be admitted without the bar.

Mr. HARPER moved, that the words, "during the present session," be struck out, which was agreed to—38 to 26.

The question on the resolution was taken and negatived—48 to 33.

On Mr. RANDOLPH's wishing to know what was the present order, Mr. SPEAKER explained it to be, that no person be admitted without the bar, on the floor of the House, except public characters, and such as are admitted by the special order of the SPEAKER.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved for the exclusion of strangers from that part of the House altogether, for which he mentioned several reasons.

This motion was negatived, without a division.

LANDS FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they insisted on their amendments, which were disagreed to by the House, and on which conferees were appointed, to the bill respecting the grant of lands for military services.

Mr. HARRISON, one of the conferees on the part of the House, afterwards reported that the conferees had agreed to recommend to the respective Houses a resolution, the import of which was, that the House should recede from their disagreement with the amendments proposed by the Senate, and agree to certain amendments proposed by the conferees.

The report was concurred in by the House.

A message was afterwards received from the Senate notifying that they had receded from their amendments, and adopted those reported by the conferees.

SUNDRY BILLS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the bill for the relief of Thomas Arnold, which was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

The House also resolved itself into Committee on the report of the select committee on the petition of John Mountjoy. Some difficulty appearing, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House also resolved itself into Committee on the report of the select committee on the petition of Isaac Zane. The committee had reported a resolution for allowing the land prayed for, and an amendment was added to introduce a proviso, that it did not come within the military lands. The report was agreed to, and the Committee instructed to report a bill accordingly.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish a General Stamp Office; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Ordered, That the Committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, relative to the Mint, have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

REPORT ON THE LOAN.

The House then went into Committee on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of a loan. The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the estimates for the public service during the present year, having taken them into consideration, and obtained from the different Departments such further information as they deemed necessary, beg leave to submit to the consideration of the House the following report on that subject:

The committee thought it proper, before they entered into the subject referred to them, to obtain from the Treasury Department a detailed estimate of the revenue and expenditure of the present year, according to existing laws. For this purpose was written to the Secretary of the Treasury the letter, of which a copy, (No. 1,) together with his answer, (No. 2,) and the estimate requested, (No. 3,) is subjoined to this report.

From this estimate it appears that the whole sum required for the public service, during the present year, including the interest and reimbursement of the public debt of every description, the civil list, army and navy, and every incidental charge, amounts to fifteen millions three hundred and ninety-three thousand and thirty-four dollars and eleven cents. But this sum includes the whole army estimate, which was founded on the supposition that the twelve regiments of infantry and six troops of horse, composing the additional army, would be immediately completed. The act, however, for suspending further enlistments, having passed one branch of the Legislature, the committee thought it proper to ascertain, as nearly as possible, what reduction in the expense of the army would result from this bill, should it pass into a law. For this purpose they wrote a letter to the Secretary of War, a copy of which, (No. 4,) with his answer, (No. 5,) and an estimate of the reduction in question, (No. 6,) they have annexed to this report. From this paper it appears that the reduction may be calculated at about one million of dollars; which, as the bill has now passed into a law, must be deducted from the former estimate of fifteen millions three hundred and ninety-three thousand and thirty-four dollars and eleven cents, and will leave a balance of fourteen millions three hundred and ninety-three thousand and thirty-four dollars and eleven cents, for the expenses of the year.

From this balance, however, the committee are of opinion that a further deduction of six hundred thousand dollars ought to be made. This sum is added to the navy estimate as a further appropriation during the present year, for the building of the six 74's. But the committee, entertaining doubts whether it would be for the benefit of the public to press the building of those ships so fast as to require this further appropriation, since they must in that case be built of timber far from sufficiently seasoned, wrote to the Secretary of the Navy requesting his opinion on this point. A copy of their letter, (No. 7,) together with his answer, (No. 8,) is hereunto subjoined. This answer, to which the committee beg leave to direct the attention of the House, furnishes, in their opinion, very sufficient reasons for avoiding that degree of expedition in building the 74's, which would require the further appropriation of six hundred thousand dollars. And they therefore think it proper to deduct that sum also from the general estimates of expenditure for the year, which will reduce that expenditure to the sum of thirteen millions seven hundred and ninety-three thousand and thirty-four dollars and eleven cents.

The whole estimated amount of revenue to meet this expenditure is nine millions three hundred and one thousand two hundred and fifty-eight dollars and fifty-one cents, as detailed in the statement (No. 3) furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, and above alluded to, which sum being deducted from the sum of thirteen millions seven hundred and ninety-three thousand and thirty-four dollars and eleven cents, which has been stated as the amount of expenditure, it leaves a balance of four millions four hundred and ninety-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty-one cents.

The Government, however, possesses funds to cover this balance in part. From the above-mentioned statement (No. 3) it appears that on the thirty-first of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, there remained in the Treasury an unexpended balance of the last year's supplies, amounting to two millions one hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and seventy-seven dollars and ten cents. A considerable part of this sum has since been paid, or will be required for the discharge of contracts remaining due for the service of last year. It is not easy to ascertain with precision what portion of this balance will remain, after satisfying all demands of this description, to be applied to the service of the present year; but the Secretary of the Treasury, in his above-mentioned statement, (No. 3) estimates it at one million of dollars—an estimate which the committee have no reason for considering as too high. They therefore place this sum to the credit of the Government, which reduces the balance to be provided for by the loan to three millions four hundred and ninety-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty-one cents—say three millions five hundred thousand dollars.

In proposing a loan to the House, the committee wish to call its attention to the propriety of providing, at the same time, permanent revenues, equal to the interest of the debt to be incurred; and of making provision, also, for the gradual and timely extinguishment of the principal—a policy which, in their opinion, ought to be invariably adhered to, as the only means of avoiding that constant accumulation of debt which is the great evil of the funding system. The committee have turned their attention to this interesting part of the subject, and have little doubt of being able to propose such measures to the House as, without materially increasing the public burdens, will add to the present revenues a sum adequate to the accomplishment of so desirable an object. But as they are not yet possessed of all the information necessary for maturing their plan, they reserve it for the subject of a further report.

In the mean time, they beg leave to present, for the consideration of the House, the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States to borrow, for the service of the present year, a sum not exceeding three millions five hundred thousand dollars, upon such terms and conditions as he shall judge most advantageous for the United States: Provided, That no contract or engagement shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed at any time after the expiration of fifteen years from the date of such loan.

The resolution was agreed to, and when taken up in the House, a bill was ordered to be prepared and reported conformably thereto by the Committee of Ways and Means.

A motion was made to adjourn till Monday, but on Mr. HARRISON's mentioning to the House the absolute necessity there was of receiving the report of the Committee of Enrollment on the bill respecting military lands, which must pass to-morrow, or the warrants would be located, by the old law, on Monday, the motion was withdrawn, and the House adjourned till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, March 1.

Mr. PARKER, from the select committee appointed for the purpose, having obtained leave, reported a bill for the government of the Marine Corps, while on shore; which was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

MONDAY, March 3.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Arnold," was read and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to establish a general Stamp Office," was also read and passed.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to borrow money for the public service; which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

Mr. PARKER from the Naval Committee, reported a bill for the better government of the Navy of the United States, and for repealing the law on the same subject, passed the second of March, 1799, which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

Mr. D. FOSTER reported a bill, from the Committee of Claims, for the relief of Campbell Smith; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements; one exhibiting the value or quantities of the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, in ships or vessels of the United States, for one year, prior to the first of October. one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight and the other, exhibiting, in like manner, the importations in ships or vessels of foreign nations during the same period; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LAKE SUPERIOR LANDS.

Mr. COOPER observed that a navy was considered an object of great importance, as was also our extended commerce, and neither of these could be carried on to any profit without a very liberal use of copper. That article could not be purchased at present at less than half a dollar a pound, but by attention to an object which was within our own power it might be had at a very low price. From these considerations he laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint an agent to purchase of the Indians that tract of land on the south side of Lake Superior, which shall include the great copper bed.

Mr. C. said, as this invaluable copper mine was well known by individuals, it no doubt would soon become an object of speculation, but wishing to make it of public utility, as it must become if purchased, he hoped the proposition would be adopted.

DIVISION OF NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

Mr. CRAIK, from the committee to whom were referred to consider whether any alteration is necessary in the judicial establishment of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and also as to the expediency of dividing the said Territory into two distinct governments, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio ought to be divided into two distinct and separate governments, divided by a line beginning at the great Miami river, and thence running north until it intersects the boundary line between the United States and Canada.

Referred to the Committee of the whole House.

JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Message of the President respecting Jonathan Robbins, when Mr. LIVINGSTON spoke about three hours in support of the resolutions he some time since submitted to the House on that subject.

Mr. BAYARD was proceeding to follow Mr. L. when a member moved the Committee to rise and ask leave to sit again. Mr. B. objected: he said he was prepared to proceed if the House would have patience at that late hour to hear him. Several members expressed a desire that he might proceed, which he was doing, when the SPEAKER hoped the gentleman would give way to a motion for the Committee to rise: he had no doubt of his friend being prepared for the discussion, but from the length the answer must necessarily take, the House certainly would be fatigued much before he would conclude. The motion was made and carried.

During Mr. LIVINGSTON's observations he introduced a copy of the record of the Circuit Court in New Jersey, where three men were tried and acquitted on a charge of piracy, and one of them for murder, on board of the same frigate and at the same time. This record, on motion of Mr. RUTLEDGE, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS, not being able to account to his satisfaction for the obvious change of conduct in our Executive in this recited instance and the one now under the consideration of the House (though precisely the same in facts) any other way than by supposing that a correspondence on the subject had occurred between the Executive of the United States and the British Government; though he expressed himself to be extremely unwilling, yet he thought it his duty to move that the President be requested to furnish it to the House.

An adjournment was immediately called and carried.

TUESDAY, March 4.

Mr. OTIS in behalf of the Committee of Defence, having first obtained leave, reported a bill from the committee to fix the compensation of the Paymaster General, and the Assistant to the Adjutant General, which was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. GALLATIN presented to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, copies of any requisition or application that may have been made by any foreign Minister, Consul, or Agent, for or concerning the delivery of William Brigstock, alias John Johnson, of John Evans, alias Michael Campbell, or of Joannes Williams, alias Joannes Williamson, who were tried in the Circuit Court of the United States, New Jersey district, on the charge of piracy committed on board the British frigate Hermione; and, also, copies of any communications to and from any of the Executive Departments, and of any papers in the possession of either of the said departments, on the subject of the commitment, trial, discharge, or delivery, of either of them.

[Mr. NICHOLAS, yesterday, just before the rising of the House, mentioned the necessity of this inquiry, but the House adjourned before a motion was made to that effect.]

Some debate took place as to the disposal of this motion.

Mr. BAYARD hoped the resolution would follow the usual course, and lie on the table for a day. If the idea was to connect the case with that of Nash, or to bring more evidence to the present case, he thought it must fail of its object. It was impossible, he said, that the decision on that case could be the least guide to the House in the present, as it was a very distinct trial, and therefore he hoped it would lie.

Mr. LIVINGSTON hoped the resolution would lie on the table till another day, and for this plain reason. What were the House to do in the meantime? He believed it perfectly connected with the business which now occupied the House, and, therefore, if it was the desire of the House to proceed, that they had better dispose of this resolution immediately. But the gentleman from Delaware had intimated that it could bring no new evidence respecting the case now before the House, because it was a case quite distinct from it. To be sure, Mr. L. said, it would operate for the benefit of the gentleman's argument if he could make the House believe so; but Mr. L. thought they were clearly the same, except it was in men, in place of trial, and in Judges who tried them. Both were for precisely the same act, and committed at the same time. It would be remarked in the warrant that it appeared these men were committed under the Treaty with Great Britain, and therefore it was more than probable that it was in consequence of application from some British agent to the Executive they were apprehended. How could the gentleman say it could give no new light? Was it possible that the conduct of the Executive in the case of Brigstock and others, in New Jersey, could afford no new light to the conduct of the same Executive, in the very same case, on the trial of Thomas Nash? Mr. L. said he knew nothing of what passed between the Executive and others; but suppose it should appear, if the House obtain possession of the communication, that application had been made before the trial, by some British agent, for the delivery up of all or either of these men, and the answer of the President had been that it was a judicial point, and therefore he did not choose to meddle with it? Certainly the gentleman would not say that this case had nothing to do with the present, in which such an extraordinary change of conduct had been evinced. If this result could arise (which it was impossible to deny) gentlemen ought to yield to the wishes of others. The plea could not now be that they would have to send to South Carolina for what was asked, because this information might be procured in a few hours; and, certainly, to obtain what was deemed so important, a small delay might well be borne.

MARCH, 1800.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

A gentleman had said it ought to have been brought forward at an earlier period. How was this possible? Mr. L. said that he did not receive the record of the New Jersey case till just before the House met yesterday; he then made use of it in the discussion, and it was not till just at the rising of the House that any gentleman could make use of it, and then a gentleman did propose something of the kind. It was a plain inference to be drawn that some communication did occur with a foreign agent, and some answer must have been given; the Executive no doubt did act on the subject—he also acted in this case. It was therefore very proper for the House to be informed how he acted.

Mr. RUTLEDGE trusted that the difficulties gentlemen had to encounter in their present precipitate way of acting would prevent them bringing forward any crimination of so great a character in future without being better prepared to substantiate it. Mr. R. said that he had no objection to call for all the information that could conveniently be had previous to the debate commencing, but to do it afterwards was most extraordinary indeed! If these proceedings were to prevail, it would be impossible to say when a vote would be taken. Gentlemen, now they have entered into the business, find that facts will not bear them out; they find they cannot substantiate what they would prove. One calls for this, another for that, and there would be no end to their calling. He wished for all possible elucidation of the subject as long as it could be proper, but after going into the argument, it was extremely improper.

But, Mr. R. asked, what had this case to do with the business of Nash? The gentleman supposed that it was considered by the Executive as a case within the judicial cognizance, and therefore he refused to act in it. Suppose it was so; and suppose the Executive afterwards changed his opinion—what he might consider an erroneous opinion? The object of this motion he believed to be to delay and finally to postpone the decision, but he hoped the House would not now agree to delay the business.

If the gentleman should hereafter think proper to promote an impeachment upon the proceedings in the case of Brigstock and others, and on that ground should ask for the papers relative thereto, he should have no objection to an acquiescence; but as this was an entirely independent case, he could see no necessity of yielding to the solicitations of gentlemen at present.

Mr. GALLATIN said, as to the late period of introducing the resolution, it must be clear that it was out of his power to propose it till the time he offered it to the House, because the facts which gave rise to it were not produced until yesterday; and as to the objects for it, the gentleman last up was quite mistaken. A gentleman had said that it was a last effort, in order to support charges against the President of the United States. As to what would be the effect of these papers if they should be sent, Mr. G. could not tell. He did not know that such papers existed at all, but the inference the gentleman had drawn was upon a presumption that they would criminate the President: this Mr. G. did not know was the fact; he knew nothing about them, they might criminate, or they might have a very contrary effect. The gentleman was extremely mistaken if it was his idea that other gentlemen were determined at all events to discover a charge; he only wished an investigation of the truth, and let that truth as well as the law dictate the proper measures to be used.

The affair having been brought before the House, he would say it was their duty to obtain all possible information, whether in favor of, or against the President; with this view he made the motion. Contrary to the opinion expressed by the gentleman last up, he must consider this case extremely similar, and he believed the most minute scrutiny could not distinguish between them. There was this difference, however, so far as the House had knowledge of at present: in one there was a requisition made; in the other there possibly was not; but whether so or not he wished to be satisfied, as well as to the ground for which a requisition was made and refused. There had been no law passed since the New Jersey case occurred to carry this 27th article of the treaty into effect, and therefore the proceedings in every case ought to have been precisely the same; but not having been so, Mr. G. said he wished to know on what rule or law the President had acted.

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

MARCH, 1800.

Much had been said as to the claim of Thomas Nash to citizenship. How far the President acted in that case with regard to citizenship would be seen; but there was one remarkable fact as to the New Jersey case. One of the men, named Brigstock, it appeared was indicted on three different charges; two of them were for piracy, and were much alike; the other was for murder; for the two first he was tried and acquitted, but for the last, a nolle prosequi was left: one remarkable difference was in the last indictment from the two others; in that he was represented as being a citizen of the United States. He thought it was very probable the nolle prosequi was ordered by the President because the man was a citizen of the United States; the opinion of the President on that case Mr. G. thought would tend much to elucidate his conduct with respect to Nash's case.

The question was then taken on the consideration of the resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 54, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, March 5.

Mr. HARRISON, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Zane; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPAIGHT proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the time for holding the District Court of North Carolina, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. COOPER called up his resolution respecting the purchase of a copper vein of the Indians, on the south side of Lake Superior; which was amended, so that the Committee inquire into the expediency of the measure.

Three members were appointed conformably thereto.

JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The resolution of Mr. GALLATIN, calling upon the President for papers in the case of Brigstock and others, tried in New Jersey, was again taken up; when,

Mr. EDMOND said he almost ceased to wonder at anything done on that floor. If the intentions of gentlemen were to lay the foundation of another inquiry, which should bring the past conduct of the President to view, perhaps this motion might then be proper; but calling for papers relative to another transaction, and not included in the original resolutions, was unaccountable, except it was to lay the foundation of an impeachment of the President; and if even that was the view, the House ought first to get rid of these troublesome resolutions. He knew it was very easy for gentlemen to get up and call for this and that testimony, and if they did not receive it, to make a handle of the refusal, by saying the evidence was precluded; but, Mr. E. said, such excuses would not in the least affect his vote.

Suppose the papers in question were obtained, he could perceive no possible application they would have to the present case; for, if the President was totally wrong in what he did respecting Johnson, (or Brigstock,) that would not prove him wrong or right in his conduct respecting Nash. The facts respecting Robbins (or Nash) were only now before the House, in the resolutions, and no other case ought to be brought to confound it. Suppose this was admitted; if the gentleman should still find himself deficient in his testimony to support the resolutions, he might want the House to send for more testimony from some other parts. This kind of conduct must take up unnecessary time, when a decision was very necessary to come to. He hoped the motion would be negatived.

Mr. MACON confessed he was astonished at the conduct he had seen exemplified in the House; it appeared to him that gentlemen were making every possible excuse to prevent that information coming before the House which the friends of the resolution said they wanted.

If, Mr. M. said, he was desirous of injuring the reputation of the President, (and that he declared he was not,) he should think himself facilitating that desire by throwing every embarrassment in the way, and refusing every sort of information on the subject; this conduct would effectually tell the public that the truth dare not be seen—that the facts are too bad to be seen. He could not think it was any great mark of friendship to the President to give rise to such conjectures as the people must and would form, by the door to investigation into his conduct being stopped. In his opinion, Mr. M. said, this seclusion of the facts went to prove that the opinion of the President, or his conduct in the New Jersey case, was right, and to reveal it would amount to an evidence that the latter was wrong with respect to Nash. If it was otherwise, the papers asked for would speak for themselves. It certainly would have a very suspicious appearance to refuse the papers, which were declared by several gentlemen to be important to their forming a decision.

Mr. M. wished to have got rid of this subject altogether; but, as it must be examined, he wished it to be done with all the evidence possible. If there were gentlemen who were enemies to the President, he declared he was not one; he desired to do him justice, which he thought could not be done by hiding any part of his conduct which was open to suspicion. If the President had changed his opinion, give him an opportunity to show that he had acted right. If the papers should prove to be of no use in the present investigation, he could see no harm that could accrue from them.

Mr. SHEPARD hoped the resolution never would be permitted to go on the Journals of the House, because it must tend to injury. The object he believed only to be delay. He thought, when the resolution was first submitted, in having anything to do with the subject the House committed a very great error; but because the House had committed one blunder, was that any reason why they should go on blundering still? He hoped the House would get rid of this subject with all possible expedition.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, if he were really a personal enemy to the President, he should rejoice at such a motion as this being opposed; he thought it a very inconsistent part of the conduct of those gentlemen who called themselves exclusive friends of the President; those gentlemen who boasted of giving up their personal ease to the service of their country, in contradistinction to those gentlemen of opposite political opinions. His bitterest enemies would not wish to place him in a more undignified situation. What inference can be drawn by the people of the United States, but that there is something rotten in the business, that will bear too hard on the conduct of the President to be made public? that he had done, in the case of Nash, without consideration, very differently from what he did in the case of Brigstock, after mature consideration?

It had appeared, in the course of this business, Mr. L. said, that some gentlemen in the House had been in the habit of corresponding with the Department of State on the case of Robbins; might it not be inferred, from their subsequent conduct, that they had discovered something which they did not choose to have exposed? Whether this was a fair inference or not it would certainly be made.

The wretched arguments with which this opposition was supported, Mr. L. said, was most extraordinary, and would be quite so, could it be supported on better grounds. The distinction of the cases, when no perceptible distinction exists; the time that it would waste, when a few hours could procure all that was asked; and, above all, the miserable excuse of trouble to the clerks in the Secretary's office; were too futile for gentlemen to suppose they could palm them upon the public. But, miserable as they are, it is a convincing proof that no better are to be found, and these are their last resort.

To suppose that no correspondence took place would be an absurdity, and equally so would it be to harbor the opinion, which gentlemen had desired to establish, that it could throw no light upon the present subject if it did appear. Gentlemen had actually presumed to say that these cases were not the same; but what gentleman had pretended to draw a shade of distinction? It was impossible, and nothing was wanted to prove this fact but a slight examination of the two cases. If they are the same, said Mr. L., it is impossible to suppose the conduct of the Executive in respect to one, and the proceedings of the court thereupon, will not be laid down as a rule for future proceeding. This opinion of the President, in the New Jersey case, was no doubt given upon due deliberation; and in a future case, so precisely the same, his conduct ought to have been the same, or, not being so, the House ought to be informed why it differed. The result could be obtained; if it should prove favorable to the character of the President, Mr. L. declared he should be as willing to admit it as those who called themselves his exclusive friends.

Mr. HARPER said, when the gentleman from New York undertook to direct others in their vote, he should be careful to give reasons which must convince their minds. For his part, Mr. H. said, he never chose to accept of advice from an enemy; but if he could get instruction from his errors, and, viewing his mistaken measures, could improve himself, he was always willing to do it. If he took advice from any man he must know that his motives were good in giving it; if, in the present instance, he could believe the design of the gentleman was to preserve the President of the United States from obloquy; if he had not discovered the "pen dipped in gall," he should be more inclined to attend to his advice. He was not afraid that the people of the United States were so stupid as to mistake the true light in which they ought to view the subject.

Was it a common practice, Mr. H. asked, to exhibit vast charges, and then go to look for the testimony? Why, did not the gentleman and his counsel, whoever they might be, know that the testimony from South Carolina, and the testimony from New Jersey, or any other, would be necessary to support their charge? They had plenty of time since the subject was first agitated. Had not this subject been talked of for eight months past, and pasteboard figures of Jonathan Robbins been exhibited at every election ground in the United States? The most ordinary rules of courts of justice in the United States forbade testimony to be admitted at such a period of the proceeding. If any public accuser in the United States was to conduct himself in that way he would get severely rapped over the knuckles, if not thrown over the bar. The matter has proceeded too far for its admission.

But, said Mr. H., what can be the use of this testimony? Gentlemen say that the Executive has decided on one case in different ways, and that, on the present occasion, he must have been wrong. One gentleman said, the claim of citizenship was important. But this is a wrong idea; the claim of citizenship, which was built on falsehood, was not made till a month after the President had acted on the case, and, consequently, it must be out of the question. It is scarcely possible that any requisition was ever made by any British agent in the case in New Jersey. Can it be supposed that the President would be guilty of such a boyish trick—of such versatility of conduct in his dealings with a foreign nation—as, in a few months, to put a different construction upon one and the same action? No; it is absolutely impossible, and gentlemen well know it.

The difference of the cases, Mr. H. said, was that, in New Jersey, the men were indicted by the Circuit Court; they were not claimed to be given up to the British. They were indicted for an offence cognizable in that court; bills were found against them; two of them were tried and acquitted, the other the President ordered a nolle prosequi entered upon. Why were the men acquitted? Was it through a defect of testimony? No, sir, said Mr. H., but through a defect in the jurisdiction. The jury well knew, being judges of law as well as of fact, that the court had no jurisdiction, and, therefore, they made a return of not guilty. Inasmuch as there was no demand made from Great Britain, the men were discharged.

Mr. H. said he was opposed to this motion on account of the principle contained in it. It was very wrong first to exhibit a charge and then go to hunt for testimony. It was like hanging a man upon a gibbet, and then seeking for his guilt. This principle had been presented to the House in various shapes, but every one was, he thought very properly, rejected, as he had no doubt this would also be. If this were to be acceded to, the next thing would be to search for a piece of evidence in Georgia or in Maine, or anything that would procure the object—delay, and its influence on a certain occasion—the “election.”

Here was a criminal charge, dressed up and blazoned out with all the false colors which a morbid imagination could invent, but which was manifestly and totally unfounded, and contrary to fact; it therefore appeared to him necessary, Mr. H. said, to come to a decision speedily, and strip the charge of its gloss, in order that its true deformity might appear, and all the world see that the intention to accuse was baffled by an exposure of truth, and the character accused justified from guilt.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman last up had given the most powerful reason why these papers were necessary that could possibly be imagined; he said, in strong language, that no requisition had ever been made, in the New Jersey case, to deliver up the men to the British. If this was a fact, most assuredly the case would not apply; but the only way to estimate that fact was to obtain a view of the papers, or know from authority that there were none. Mr. S. said he could not draw that conclusion. He believed that a requisition had been made; that it was precisely the same as the South Carolina case; and that the papers relating to it would be completely in point; to which the House ought to have access, and not go to British statutes and law books when the country produced a precedent.

The gentleman last up had said that the jury, being judges of law and fact, determined that there was no jurisdiction. How that was he could not say; the verdict was, not guilty; which, most likely, was a verdict upon facts. Suppose it should turn out, by the documents, that requisition was made for these men, and they should prove that two of them were liberated for want of sufficient proof; suppose it should turn out that this very Lieutenant Foreshaw was sworn to have been killed by Brigstock, and yet, now, Nash is charged with having killed Foreshaw; suppose it should turn out that Brigstock was an American citizen, and being such, was liberated from further prosecution, because the President might have thought that an American citizen, impressed on board a British ship-of-war, was justified in getting his liberty. These things might appear; the same claim of citizenship was now made; and, in his opinion, a jury trial ought to have been had in order to ascertain facts so material to a man's personal interest.

Mr. HARPER explained: that the said documents did not discover any requisition having been made in the New Jersey case. And, further, instead of positively saying the jury had acquitted for want of jurisdiction, he said it was presumed so.

Mr. SMILIE said, there was another fact stated by the gentleman which was incorrect; he said that the figure of J. Robbins was hung up at every election ground. This was not true, for Mr. S. said he was at one election where it was not hung up. [Several other gentlemen also declared that they saw no such thing in their respective districts, but they heard of it in some few places.] One extraordinary feature, Mr. SMILIE observed, was easily perceived throughout the whole of this attempt to investigate facts—it appeared that gentlemen were determined to exculpate the President, at all events; he was not ready to do so, nor was he ready to accuse him; he only wished to do what was right and lawful, for which purpose he wished every document that could assist him. It was strange, that while there were papers which, it was said, would make the whole of the Executive conduct appear free of blame, the friends of the Executive should refuse them. How could gentlemen say they had not withheld important testimony, when all the world must perceive that facts were yet hidden that would throw light on the case.

Mr. H. LEE said, he had hitherto voted with gentlemen who asked for papers; he did it because they themselves said they wanted such papers to guide their decision; he was unwilling they should have any excuse. Supposing that other information might possibly be procured, and anxious to obtain it, he wrote to the Secretary of State, but received for answer that there was none.

MARCH, 1800.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

Mr. L. said he did it, in case there had been any papers, that they should be produced. He should have voted on the present question in the same way, but, from what he had perceived, he found that any attempts to gratify those gentlemen were in vain, and that to encourage it would be wasting day after day, without any hope of settling the main inquiry before the next session of Congress. Besides, Mr. L. said, the session was far spent, and not one public bill was yet passed. And should so many days be spent on a matter of so little consequence as considering the case of an individual who had transgressed the law, and very properly suffered for his crimes? He hoped not. From this moment he was determined, by his vote, to stop every attempt to delay a final decision.

Mr. L. contended that the President had a right to change his proceedings, according to his opinion, if he should be convinced of the propriety of it. It was a privilege every public character enjoyed. He would not vote for a postponement, which he must do, were he to vote for the motion.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought there was a very great probability that a requisition was made in the New Jersey case. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HARPER) said there were none; but how did he know it? Did the gentleman believe that the British Ministry were not as desirous to have these men delivered as they were of the other? To suppose they acted understandingly; to suppose they were desirous of pursuing one steady object, unremittingly, as they always had done, would warrant a strong presumption that they did demand those men. It was impossible but the papers in question must either add to or diminish the construction put upon this case, and solve some important queries.

Mr. DANA thought the conduct of the President was consistent, Constitutional, and proper, and that it was out of the power of any gentleman to prove the contrary. One great reason for thinking this was, the manner this charge had been conducted from its first appearance, which was contrary to all legal knowledge and Constitutional principles. He defied any gentleman to produce a precedent, in any public body, except it was in the proceedings of the Revolutionary Government of France. The manner of conducting the business being totally wrong, Mr. D. said he did not expect to receive the least conviction from anything that would be brought forward, or any arguments which would be used.

Gentlemen had said it would awaken dreadful suspicions if the motion was negative. And were the House to be deterred from their duty at the apparition of a demagogue? No, he trusted not; because he well knew that men of understanding would approve their conduct; and if weak and silly men disapproved, he was willing to bear it from them.

If gentlemen would look to the record they would find that the cases were different; these men were charged under the statute of the United States, the other was not. The proceeding being different, the case could not enlighten us.

As well might gentlemen ask for the whole of the State trials in order to discover the law on impeachments.

Mr. GALLATIN contended, that if investigation was the object of the House, they ought to grant the resolution. Whether it was admitted or not, it would be impossible to deny one fact—that the court did admit jurisdiction in that case, which was exactly similar to this, and that the court of South Carolina did assume jurisdiction. Whether the demand was made in the Jersey case or not, it was clear that it was made in the case of Nash, and that it was complied with; and this man, by the advice of the President, was taken out of the hands of the Judiciary.

But to know how exactly the circumstances attending the Jersey case correspond with the latter, the papers were certainly desirable. This was a case in point, much better than all which the English authorities could produce; and there being a different decision, it certainly ought to be known why that difference did occur. The gentleman from South Carolina had stated that no jurisdiction was admitted by the jury, and therefore the men were acquitted, and that no requisitions were made; to be sure, he afterwards said it was all founded on supposition. Now, whether these were or were not facts, the papers would tell. By knowing all the circumstances of that case, a decision could be formed with more accuracy as to the other case.

Mr. DAVIS said he was desirous of avoiding this disagreeable subject, but as a majority of the House thought differently, and they determining, he should give a vote, however contrary to his will. He certainly wished to meet it with all the information in the power of the House. The gentleman from New York had brought forward certain resolutions which he had defended. The gentleman from South Carolina said they were blazoned with falsehood. Now, which of these two gentlemen, Mr. D. asked, was he to believe? How could he form an opinion without the facts being produced? He wished not to be forced to form it upon bare conjecture—he wished to have truths before him. Certainly, if he was refused facts, he must suppose there was some great reason against the disclosure. He asked gentlemen to recollect in what a situation they placed the Executive, exposed to such censure. Let everything appear that will do honor to the character of that gentleman, but to afford such crippled testimony never would acquit the President in the eyes of the American people, if that House should be satisfied that his conduct was honorable.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 46, as follows:

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the Message, when Mr. BAYARD proceeded, in answer to Mr. LIVINGSTON, in which he spoke about three hours. The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, March 6.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Message of the President, in the case of Jonathan Robbins, when Mr. NICHOLAS spoke about three hours in favor of the resolutions introduced by Mr. LIVINGSTON, which were negatived—yeas 34, nays 58.

Some discussion then took place on taking up the resolution presented by Mr. BAYARD, which was also with the Committee of the Whole House. The Committee at length rose without entering upon it, and reported their disagreement to the resolutions proposed by Mr. LIVINGSTON; and the question whether the Committee should have leave to sit again was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 59, nays 38, as follows:

The question was then before the House to agree to the report of the Committee in their disagreement with the resolutions.

Mr. GALLATIN rose, and entered generally into the argument, in a speech of about two hours, after which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 7.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia were referred to the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business.

Mr. SPAIGHT, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the District Court of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and committed for Monday next.

Mr. HARPER presented a petition of about fifty families, residing on a tract of territory ceded by the State of South Carolina to the United States, stating that they had been left unprotected and unacknowledged by any civil authority, and praying to be placed under such government as Congress in their wisdom may see fit. Referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The House took up the unfinished business of yesterday, and the question, Will the House agree with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to Mr. LIVINGSTON's resolutions? being under consideration.

Mr. MARSHALL said, that believing, as he did most seriously, that in a Government constituted like that of the United States, much of the public happiness depended, not only on its being rightly administered, but on the measures of Administration being rightly understood—on rescuing public opinion from those numerous prejudices with which so many causes might combine to surround it, he could not but have been highly gratified with the very eloquent, and what was still more valuable, the very able and very correct argument which had been delivered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) against the resolutions now under consideration. He had not expected that the effect of this argument would be universal; but he had cherished the hope, and in this he had not been disappointed, that it would be very extensive. He did not flatter himself with being able to shed much new light on the subject; but, as the argument in opposition to the resolutions had been assailed with considerable ability by gentlemen of great talents, he trusted the House would not think the time misapplied which would be devoted to the reestablishment of the principles contained in that argument, and to the refutation of those advanced in opposition to it. In endeavoring to do this, he should notice the observations in support of the resolutions, not in the precise order in which they were made; but as they applied to the different points he deemed it necessary to maintain, in order to demonstrate, that the conduct of the Executive of the United States could not justly be charged with the errors imputed to it by the resolutions.

MARCH, 1800.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

His first proposition, he said, was that the case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the President, was completely within the 27th article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, entered into between the United States of America and Great Britain.

He read the article, and then observed: The casus fœderis of this article occurs, when a person, having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, and having sought an asylum in the country of the other, is charged with the crime, and his delivery demanded, on such proof of his guilt as, according to the laws of the place where he shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed.

The case stated is, that Thomas Nash, having committed murder on board of a British frigate, navigating the high seas under a commission from His Britannic Majesty, had sought an asylum within the United States; on this case his delivery was demanded by the Minister of the King of Great Britain.

It is manifest that the case stated, if supported by proof, is within the letter of the article, provided a murder committed in a British frigate, on the high seas, be committed within the jurisdiction of that nation. That such a murder is within their jurisdiction, has been fully shown by the gentleman from Delaware. The principle is, that the jurisdiction of a nation extends to the whole of its territory, and to its own citizens in every part of the world. The laws of a nation are rightfully obligatory on its own citizens in every situation where those laws are really extended to them. This principle is founded on the nature of civil union. It is supported everywhere by public opinion, and is recognised by writers on the laws of nations. Rutherford, in his second volume, page 180, says: "The jurisdiction which a civil society has over the persons of its members, affects them immediately, whether they are within its territories or not."

This general principle is especially true, and is particularly recognised, with respect to the fleets of a nation on the high seas. To punish offences committed in its fleet, is the practice of every nation in the universe; and consequently the opinion of the world is, that a fleet at sea is within the jurisdiction of the nation to which it belongs. Rutherford, vol. ii. p. 491, says: "there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of a nation over the persons which compose its fleets, when they are out at sea, whether they are sailing upon it or are stationed in any particular part of it."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN,) though he has not directly controverted this doctrine, has sought to weaken it by observing that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea could not be complete even in its own vessels; and in support of this position he urged the admitted practice of submitting to search for contraband—a practice not tolerated on land, within the territory of a neutral Power. The rule is as stated; but is founded on a principle which does not affect the jurisdiction of a nation over its citizens or subjects in its ships. The principle is, that in the sea itself no nation has any jurisdiction. All may equally exercise their rights, and consequently the right of a belligerent Power to prevent aid being given to his enemy, is not restrained by any superior right of a neutral in the place. But, if this argument possessed any force, it would not apply to national ships-of-war, since the usage of nations does not permit them to be searched.

According to the practice of the world, then, and the opinions of writers on the law of nations, the murder committed on board of a British frigate navigating the high seas, was a murder committed within the jurisdiction of the British nation.

Although such a murder is plainly within the letter of the article, it has been contended not to be within its just construction; because at sea all nations have a common jurisdiction, and the article correctly construed, will not embrace a case of concurrent jurisdiction.

It is deemed unnecessary to controvert this construction, because the proposition, that the United States had no jurisdiction over the murder committed by Thomas Nash, is believed to be completely demonstrable.

It is not true that all nations have jurisdiction over all offences committed at sea. On the contrary, no nation has any jurisdiction at sea, but over its own citizens or vessels, or offences against itself. This principle is laid down in 2 Ruth. 488, 491.

The American Government has, on a very solemn occasion, avowed the same principle. The first Minister of the French Republic asserted and exercised powers of so extraordinary a nature, as unavoidably to produce a controversy with the United States. The situation in which the Government then found itself was such as necessarily to occasion a very serious and mature consideration of the opinions it should adopt. Of consequence, the opinions then declared deserve great respect. In the case alluded to, Mr. Genet had asserted the right of fitting out privateers in the American ports, and of manning them with American citizens, in order to cruise against nations with whom America was at peace. In reasoning against this extravagant claim, the then Secretary of State, in his letter of the 17th of June, 1793, says:

"For our citizens then to commit murders and depredations on the members of nations at peace with us, or to combine to do it, appeared to the Executive, and to those whom they consulted, as much against the laws of the land as to murder or rob, or combine to murder or rob its own citizens; and as much to require punishment, if done within their limits, where they have a territorial jurisdiction, or on the high seas, where they have a personal jurisdiction, that is to say, one which reaches their own citizens only; this being an appropriate part of each nation, on an element where all have a common jurisdiction."

The well considered opinion, then, of the American Government on this subject is, that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea is "personal," reaching its "own citizens only;" and that this is the "appropriate part of each nation" on that element.

This is precisely the opinion maintained by the opposers of the resolutions. If the jurisdiction of America at sea be personal, reaching its own citizens only; if this be its appropriate part, then the jurisdiction of the nation cannot extend to a murder committed by a British sailor, on board a British frigate navigating the high seas under a commission from His Britannic Majesty.

As a further illustration of the principle contended for, suppose a contract made at sea, and a suit instituted for the recovery of money which might be due thereon. By the laws of what nation would the contract be governed? The principle is general that a personal contract follows the person, but is governed by the law of the place where it is formed. By what law then would such a contract be governed? If all nations had jurisdiction over the place, then the laws of all nations would equally influence the contract; but certainly no man will hesitate to admit that such a contract ought to be decided according to the laws of that nation to which the vessel or contracting parties might belong.

Suppose a duel, attended with death, in the fleet of a foreign nation, or in any vessel which returned safe to port, could it be pretended that any Government on earth, other than that to which the fleet or vessel belonged, had jurisdiction in the case; or that the offender could be tried by the laws or tribunals of any other nation whatever?

Suppose a private theft by one mariner from another, and the vessel to perform its voyage and return in safety, would it be contended that all nations have equal cognizance of the crime, and are equally authorized to punish it?

If there be this common jurisdiction at sea, why not punish desertion from one belligerent Power to another, or correspondence with the enemy, or any other crime which may be perpetrated? A common jurisdiction over all offences at sea, in whatever vessel committed, would involve the power of punishing the offences which have been stated. Yet, all gentlemen will disclaim this power. It follows, then, that no such common jurisdiction exists.

In truth the right of every nation to punish is limited, in its nature, to offences against the nation inflicting the punishment. This principle is believed to be universally true. It comprehends every possible violation of its laws on its own territory, and it extends to violations committed elsewhere by persons it has a right to bind. It extends also to general piracy.

A pirate, under the law of nations, is an enemy of the human race. Being the enemy of all, he is liable to be punished by all. Any act which denotes this universal hostility, is an act of piracy.

Not only an actual robbery, therefore, but cruising on the high seas without commission, and with intent to rob, is piracy. This is an offence against all and every nation, and is therefore alike punishable by all. But an offence which in its nature affects only a particular nation, is only punishable by that nation.

It is by confounding general piracy with piracy by statute, that indistinct ideas have been produced, respecting the power to punish offences committed on the high seas.

A statute may make any offence piracy, committed within the jurisdiction of the nation passing the statute, and such offence will be punishable by that nation. But piracy under the law of nations, which alone is punishable by all nations, can only consist in an act which is an offence against all. No particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offences thus punishable.

It had been observed by his colleague, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) for the purpose of showing that the distinction taken on this subject by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) was inaccurate, that any vessel robbed on the high seas could be the property only of a single nation, and being only an offence against that nation, could be, on the principle taken by the opposers of the resolutions, no offence against the law of nations; but in this his colleague had not accurately considered the principle. As a man who turns out to rob on the highway, and forces from a stranger his purse with a pistol at his bosom, is not the particular enemy of that stranger, but alike the enemy of every man who carries a purse, so those who without a commission rob on the high seas, manifest a temper hostile to all nations, and therefore become the enemies of all. The same inducements which occasion the robbery of one vessel, exist to occasion the robbery of others, and therefore the single offence is an offence against the whole community of nations, manifests a temper hostile to all, is the commencement of an attack on all, and is consequently, of right, punishable by all.

His colleague had also contended that all the offences at sea, punishable by the British statutes from which the act of Congress was in a great degree copied, were piracies at common law, or by the law of nations, and as murder is among these, consequently murder was an act of piracy by the law of nations, and therefore punishable by every nation. In support of this position he had cited 1 Hawk. P. C. 267, 271-3, Inst. 112, and 1 Woodeson 140.

The amount of these cases is, that no new offence is made piracy by the statutes; but that a different tribunal is created for their trial, which is guided by a different rule from that which governed previous to those statutes. Therefore, on an indictment for piracy, it is still necessary to prove an offence which was piracy before the statutes. He drew from these authorities a very different conclusion from that which had been drawn by his colleague. To show the correctness of his conclusion, it was necessary to observe, that the statute did not indeed change the nature of piracy, since it only transferred the trial of the crime to a different tribunal, where different rules of decision prevailed; but having done this, other crimes committed on the high seas, which were not piracy, were made punishable by the same tribunal; but certainly this municipal regulation could not be considered as proving that those offences were, before, piracy by the law of nations. [Mr. NICHOLAS insisted that the law was not correctly stated, whereupon Mr. MARSHALL called for 3 Inst. and read the statute:]

"All treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the seas, &c., shall be inquired, tried, heard, determined and judged in such shires, &c., in like form and condition as if any such offence had been committed on the land," &c. "And such as shall be convicted, &c., shall have and suffer such pains of death, &c., as if they had been attainted of any treason, felony, robbery, or other the said offences done upon the land."

This statute, it is certain, does not change the nature of piracy; but all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the sea, are not declared to have been, nor are they piracies. If a man be indicted as a pirate, the offence must be shown to have been piracy before the statute; but if he be indicted for treason, felony, robbery, murder, or confederacy, committed at sea, whether such offence was or was not a piracy, he shall be punished in like manner as if he had committed the same offence on land. The passage cited from 1 Woodeson, 140, is a full authority to this point. Having stated that offences committed at sea were formerly triable before the Lord High Admiral, according to the course of the Roman civil law, Woodeson says:

"But, by the statutes 27 H. 8. c. 4, and 28 H. 8. c. 15, all treasons, felonies, piracies and other crimes committed on the sea, or where the admiral has jurisdiction, shall be tried in the realm as if done on land. But the statutes referred to affect only the manner of the trial so far as respects piracy. The nature of the offence is not changed. Whether a charge amount to piracy or not, must still depend on the law of nations, except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of Parliament have declared that the crimes therein specified shall be adjudged piracy, or shall be liable to the same mode of trial and degree of punishment."

This passage proves not only that all offences at sea are not piracies by the law of nations, but also that all indictments for piracy must depend on the law of nations, "except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of Parliament" have changed the law. Why do not these "express acts of Parliament" change the law as to others than "British subjects?" The words are general, "all treasons, felonies, &c." Why are they confined in construction to British subjects? The answer is a plain one: The jurisdiction of the nation is confined to its territory and to its own subjects.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAL-LATIN) abandons, and very properly abandons, this untenable ground. He admits that no nation has a right to punish offences against another nation, and that the United States can only punish offences against their own laws and the law of nations. He admits, too, that if there had only been a mutiny (and consequently if there had only been a murder) on board the Hermione, that the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Yet mutiny is punishable as piracy by the law of both nations. That gentleman contends that the act committed by Nash was piracy, according to the law of nations. He supports his position by insisting that the offence may be constituted by the commission of a single act; that unauthorized robbery on the high seas is this act, and that the crew having seized the vessel, and being out of the protection of any nation, were pirates.

It is true that the offence may be completed by a single act; but it depends on the nature of that act. If it be such as manifests generally hostility against the world—an intention to rob generally, then it is piracy; but if it be merely a mutiny and murder in a vessel, for the purpose of delivering it up to the enemy, it seems to be an offence against a single nation and not to be piracy. The sole object of the crew might be to go over to the enemy, or to free themselves from the tyranny experienced on board a ship-of-war, and not to rob generally.

But, should it even be true that running away with a vessel to deliver her up to an enemy was an act of general piracy, punishable by all nations, yet the mutiny and murder was a distinct offence. Had the attempt to seize the vessel failed, after the commission of the murder, then, according to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Whatever then might have been the law respecting the piracy, of the murder there was no jurisdiction. For the murder, not the piracy, Nash was delivered up. Murder, and not piracy, is comprehended in the 27th article of the treaty between the two nations. Had he been tried then and acquitted on an indictment for the piracy, he must still have been delivered up for the murder, of which the court could have no jurisdiction. It is certain that an acquittal of the piracy would not have discharged the murder; and, therefore, in the so much relied on trials at Trenton, a separate indictment for murder was filed after an indictment for piracy. Since, then, if acquitted for piracy, he must have been delivered to the British Government on the charge of murder, the President of the United States might, very properly, without prosecuting for the piracy, direct him to be delivered up on the murder.

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

MARCH, 1800.

All the gentlemen who have spoken in support of the resolutions, have contended that the case of Thomas Nash is within the purview of the act of Congress, which relates to this subject, and is by that act made punishable in the American courts. That is, that the act of Congress designed to punish crimes committed on board a British frigate. Nothing can be more completely demonstrable than the untruth of this proposition.

It has already been shown that the legislative jurisdiction of a nation extends only to its own territory, and to its own citizens, wherever they may be. Any general expression in a legislative act must, necessarily, be restrained to objects within the jurisdiction of the Legislature passing the act. Of consequence an act of Congress can only be construed to apply to the territory of the United States, comprehending every person within it, and to the citizens of the United States.

But, independent of this undeniable truth, the act itself affords complete testimony of its intention and extent. (See Laws of the United States, vol. i. p. 10.) The title is: "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." Not against Britain, France, or the world, but singly "against the United States."

The first section relates to treason, and its objects are, "any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States." This description comprehends only the citizens of the United States, and such others as may be on its territory or in its service.

The second section relates to misprision of treason; and declares, without limitation, that any person or persons, having knowledge of any treason, and not communicating the same, shall be guilty of that crime. Here then is an instance of that limited description of persons in one section, and of that general description in another, which has been relied on to support the construction contended for by the friends of the resolutions. But will it be pretended that a person can commit misprision of treason who cannot commit treason itself? That he would be punishable for concealing a treason who could not be punished for plotting it? Or, can it be supposed that the act designed to punish an Englishman or a Frenchman, who, residing in his own country, should have knowledge of treasons against the United States, and should not cross the Atlantic to reveal them?

The same observations apply to the sixth section, which makes any "person or persons" guilty of misprision of felony, who, having knowledge of murder or other offences enumerated in that section, should conceal them. It is impossible to apply this to a foreigner, in a foreign land, or to any person not owing allegiance to the United States.

The eighth section, which is supposed to comprehend the case, after declaring that if any "person or persons" shall commit murder on the high seas, he shall be punishable with death, proceeds to say, that if any captain or mariner shall piratically run away with a ship or vessel, or yield her up voluntarily to a pirate, or if any seaman shall lay violent hands on his commander, to prevent his fighting, or shall make a revolt in the ship, every such offender shall be adjudged a pirate and a felon.

The persons who are the objects of this section of the act are all described in general terms, which might embrace the subjects of all nations. But is it to be supposed that, if in an engagement between an English and a French ship-of-war, the crew of the one or the other should lay violent hands on the captain and force him to strike, that this would be an offence against the act of Congress, punishable in the courts of the United States? On this extended construction of the general terms of the section, not only the crew of one of the foreign vessels forcing their captain to surrender to another, would incur the penalties of the act, but, if in the late action between the gallant Truxtun and the French frigate, the crew of that frigate had compelled the captain to surrender, while he was unwilling to do so, they would have been indictable as felons in the courts of the United States. But surely the act of Congress admits of no such extravagant construction.

His colleague, Mr. M. said, had cited and particularly relied on the ninth section of the act; that section declares, that if a citizen shall commit any of the enumerated piracies, or any acts of hostility, on the high seas, against the United States, under color of a commission from any foreign Prince or State, he shall be adjudged a pirate, felon, and robber, and shall suffer death.

This section is only a positive extension of the act to a case which might otherwise have escaped punishment. It takes away the protection of a foreign commission from an American citizen, who, on the high seas, robs his countrymen. This is no exception from any preceding part of the law, because there is no part which relates to the conduct of vessels commissioned by a foreign Power; it only proves that, in the opinion of the Legislature, the penalties of the act could not, without this express provision, have been incurred by a citizen holding a foreign commission.

It is most certain, then, that the act of Congress does not comprehend the case of a murder committed on board a foreign ship-of-war.

The gentleman from New York has cited 2 Woodeson, 428, to show that the courts of England extend their jurisdiction to piracies committed by the subjects of foreign nations.

This has not been doubted. The case from Woodeson is a case of robberies committed on the high seas by a vessel without authority. There are ordinary acts of piracy which, as has been already stated, being offences against all nations, are punishable by all. The case from 2 Woodeson, and the note cited from the same book by the gentleman from Delaware, are strong authorities against the doctrines contended for by the friends of the resolutions.

It has also been contended that the question of jurisdiction was decided at Trenton, by receiving indictments against persons there arraigned for the same offence, and by retaining them for trial after the return of the habeas corpus.

Every person in the slightest degree acquainted with judicial proceedings, knows that an indictment is no evidence of jurisdiction; and that, in criminal cases, the question of jurisdiction will seldom be made but by arrest of judgment after conviction.

The proceedings, after the return of the habeas corpus, only prove that the case was not such a case as to induce the Judge immediately to decide against his jurisdiction. The question was not free from doubt, and, therefore, might very properly be postponed until its decision should become necessary.

It has been argued by the gentleman from New York, that the form of the indictment is, itself, evidence of a power in the court to try the case. Every word of that indictment, said the gentleman, gives the lie to a denial of the jurisdiction of the court.

It would be assuming a very extraordinary principle, indeed, to say that words inserted in an indictment for the express purpose of assuming the jurisdiction of a court, should be admitted to prove that jurisdiction. The question certainly depended on the nature of the fact, and not on the description of the fact. But as an indictment must necessarily contain formal words in order to be supported, and as forms often denote what a case must substantially be to authorize a court to take cognizance of it, some words in the indictments at Trenton ought to be noticed. The indictments charge the persons to have been within the peace, and murder to have been committed against the peace, of the United States. These are necessary averments, and, to give the court jurisdiction, the fact ought to have accorded with them. But who will say that the crew of a British frigate on the high seas, are within the peace of the United States? or a murder committed on board such a frigate, against the peace of any other than the British Government?

It is, then, demonstrated that the murder with which Thomas Nash was charged, was not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, and, consequently, that the case stated was completely within the letter and the spirit of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the two nations. If the necessary evidence was produced, he ought to have been delivered up to justice. It was an act to which the American nation was bound by a most solemn compact. To have tried him for the murder would have been mere mockery. To have condemned and executed him, the court having no jurisdiction, would have been murder. To have acquitted and discharged him would have been a breach of faith, and a violation of national duty.

But it has been contended that, although Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British Minister, on the requisition made by him in the name of his Government, yet, the interference of the President was improper.

This, Mr. M. said, led to his second proposition, which was:

That the case was a case for Executive and not Judicial decision. He admitted implicitly the division of powers, stated by the gentleman from

New York, and that it was the duty of each department to resist the encroachments of the others.

This being established, the inquiry was, to what department was the power in question allotted?

The gentleman from New York had relied on the second section of the third article of the Constitution, which enumerates the cases to which the Judicial power of the United States extends, as expressly including that now under consideration. Before he examined that section, it would not be improper to notice a very material misstatement of it made in the resolutions, offered by the gentleman from New York. By the Constitution, the Judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; but the resolutions declare that Judicial power to extend to all questions arising under the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States. The difference between the Constitution and the resolutions was material and apparent. A case in law or equity was a term well understood, and of limited signification. It was a controversy between parties which had taken a shape for judicial decision. If the Judicial power extended to every question under the Constitution, it would involve almost every subject proper for Legislative discussion and decision; if, to every question under the laws and treaties of the United States, it would, involve almost every subject on which the Executive could act. The division of power which the gentleman had stated, could exist no longer, and the other departments would be swallowed up by the Judiciary. But it was apparent that the resolutions had essentially misrepresented the Constitution. He did not charge the gentleman from New York with intentional misrepresentation; he would not attribute to him such an artifice in any case, much less in a case where detection was so easy and so certain. Yet this substantial departure from the Constitution, in resolutions affecting substantially to unite it, was not less worthy of remark for being unintentional. It manifested the course of reasoning by which the gentleman had himself been misled, and his judgment betrayed into the opinions those resolutions expressed. By extending the Judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the Constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit.

A case in law or equity proper for judicial decision may arise under a treaty, where the rights of individuals acquired or secured by a treaty are to be asserted or defended in court. As under the fourth or sixth article of the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, or under those articles of our late treaties with France, Prussia, and other nations, which secure to the subjects of those nations their property within the United States; or, as would be an article, which, instead of stipulating to deliver up an offender, should stipulate his punishment, provided the case was punishable by the laws and in the courts of the United States. But the Judicial power cannot extend to political compacts; as the establishment of the boundary line between the American and British dominions; the case of the late guarantee in our Treaty with France, or the case of the delivery of a murderer under the twenty-seventh article of our present Treaty with Britain.

H. of R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

MARCH, 1800.

The gentleman from New York has asked, triumphantly asked, what power exists in our courts to deliver up an individual to a foreign Government? Permit me, said Mr. M., but not triumphantly, to retort the question. By what authority can any court render such a judgment? What power does a court possess to seize any individual and determine that he shall be adjudged by a foreign tribunal? Surely our courts possess no such power, yet they must possess it, if this article of the treaty is to be executed by the courts.

Gentlemen have cited and relied on that clause in the Constitution, which enables Congress to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; together with an act of Congress, declaring the punishment of those offences; as transferring the whole subject to the courts. But that clause can never be construed to make to the Government a grant of power, which the people making it do not themselves possess. It has already been shown that the people of the United States have no jurisdiction over offences committed on board a foreign ship against a foreign nation. Of consequence, in framing a Government for themselves, they cannot have passed this jurisdiction to that Government. The law, therefore, cannot act upon the case. But this clause of the Constitution cannot be considered, and need not be considered, as affecting acts which are piracy under the law of nations. As the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and piracy under the law of nations is of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, punishable by every nation, the judicial power of the United States of course extends to it. On this principle the Courts of Admiralty under the Confederation took cognizance of piracy, although there was no express power in Congress to define and punish the offence.

But the extension of judicial power of the United States to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction must necessarily be understood with some limitation. All cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction which, from their nature, are triable in the United States, are submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

There are cases of piracy by the law of nations, and cases within the legislative jurisdiction of the nation; the people of America possessed no other power over the subject, and could consequently transfer no other to their courts; and it has already been proved that a murder committed on board a foreign ship-of-war is not comprehended within this description.

The Consular Convention with France, has also been relied on, as proving the act of delivering up an individual to a foreign Power to be in its nature Judicial and not Executive.

The ninth article of that Convention authorizes the Consuls and Vice Consuls of either nation to cause to be arrested all deserters from their vessels, "for which purpose the said Consuls and Vice Consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent."

This article of the Convention does not, like the 27th article of the Treaty with Britain, stipulate a national act, to be performed on the demand of a nation; it only authorizes a foreign Minister to cause an act to be done, and prescribes the course he is to pursue. The contract itself is, that the act shall be performed by the agency of the foreign Consul, through the medium of the courts; but this affords no evidence that a contract of a very different nature is to be performed in the same manner.

It is said that the then President of the United States declared the incompetency of the courts, judges, and officers, to execute this contract without an act of the Legislature. But the then President made no such declaration.

He has said that some legislative provision is requisite to carry the stipulations of the Convention into full effect. This, however, is by no means declaring the incompetency of a department to perform an act stipulated by treaty, until the legislative authority shall direct its performance.

It has been contended that the conduct of the Executive on former occasions, similar to this in principle, has been such as to evince an opinion, even in that department, that the case in question is proper for the decision of the courts.

The fact adduced to support this argument is the determination of the late President on the case of prizes made within the jurisdiction of the United States, or by privateers fitted out in their ports.

The nation was bound to deliver up those prizes in like manner, as the nation is now bound to deliver up an individual demanded under the 27th article of the Treaty with Britain. The duty was the same, and devolved on the same department.

In quoting the decision of the Executive on that case, the gentleman from New York has taken occasion to bestow a high encomium on the late President; and to consider his conduct as furnishing an example worthy the imitation of his successor. It must be the cause of much delight to the real friends of that great man; to those who supported his Administration while in office from a conviction of its wisdom and its virtue, to hear the unqualified praise which is now bestowed on it by those who had been supposed to possess different opinions. If the measure now under consideration shall be found, on examination, to be the same in principle with that which has been cited, by its opponents, as a fit precedent for it, then may the friends of the gentleman now in office indulge the hope, that when he, like his predecessor, shall be no more, his conduct too may be quoted as an example for the government of his successors.

MARCH, 1800.

The evidence relied on to prove the opinion of the then Executive on the case, consists of two letters from the Secretary of State, the one of the 29th of June, 1793, to Mr. Genet, and the other of the 16th of August, 1793, to Mr. Morris.

In the letter to Mr. Genet, the Secretary says, that the claimant having filed his libel against the ship William, in the Court of Admiralty, there was no power which could take the vessel out of court until it had decided against its own jurisdiction; that having so decided, the complaint is lodged with the Executive, and he asks for evidence, to enable that department to consider and decide finally on the subject.

It will be difficult to find in this letter an Executive opinion, that the case was not a case for Executive decision. The contrary is clearly avowed. It is true, that when an individual, claiming the property as his, had asserted that claim in court, the Executive acknowledges in itself a want of power to dismiss or decide upon the claim thus pending in court. But this argues no opinion of a want of power in itself to decide upon the case, if, instead of being carried before a court as an individual claim, it is brought before the Executive as a national demand. A private suit instituted by an individual, asserting his claim to property, can only be controlled by that individual. The Executive can give no direction concerning it. But a public prosecution carried on in the name of the United States can, without impropriety, be dismissed at the will of the Government. The opinion, therefore, given in this letter, is unquestionably correct; but it is certainly misunderstood, when it is considered as being an opinion that the question was not in its nature a question for Executive decision.

In the letter to Mr. Morris, the Secretary asserts the principle, that vessels taken within our jurisdiction ought to be restored, but says, it is yet unsettled whether the act of restoration is to be performed by the Executive or Judicial department. The principles, then, according to this letter, is not submitted to the courts—whether a vessel captured within a given distance of the American coast, was or was not captured within the jurisdiction of the United States, was a question not to be determined by the courts, but by the Executive. The doubt expressed is not what tribunal shall settle the principle, but what tribunal shall settle the fact. In this respect, a doubt might exist in the case of prizes, which could not exist in the case of a man. Individuals on each side claimed the property, and therefore their rights could be brought into court, and there contested as a case in law or equity. The demand of a man made by a nation stands on different principles.

Having noticed the particular letters cited by the gentleman from New York, permit me now, said Mr. M., to ask the attention of the House to the whole course of Executive conduct on this interesting subject.

It is first mentioned in a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Genet, of the 25th of June,

6th CON.—20

1793. In that letter, the Secretary states a consultation between himself and the Secretaries of the Treasury and War, (the President being absent,) in which (so well were they assured of the President's way of thinking in those cases,) it was determined that the vessels should be detained in the custody of the Consuls, in the ports, until the Government of the United States shall be able to inquire into and decide on the fact.

In his letter of the 12th of July, 1793, the Secretary writes, the President has determined to refer the questions concerning prizes "to persons learned in the laws," and he requests that certain vessels enumerated in the letter should not depart "until his ultimate determination shall be made known."

In his letter of the 7th of August, 1793, the Secretary informs Mr. Genet that the President considers the United States as bound "to effectuate the restoration of, or to make compensation for, prizes which shall have been made of any of the parties at war with France, subsequent to the 5th day of June last, by privateers fitted out of our ports." That it is consequently expected that Mr. Genet will cause restitution of such prizes to be made, and that the United States "will cause restitution" to be made "of all such prizes as shall be hereafter brought within their ports by any of the said privateers."

In his letter of the 10th of November, 1793, the Secretary informs Mr. Genet, that for the purpose of obtaining testimony to ascertain the fact of capture within the jurisdiction of the United States, the Governors of the several States were requested, on receiving any such claim, immediately to notify thereof the Attorneys of their several districts, whose duty it would be to give notice "to the principal agent of both parties, and also to the Consuls of the nations interested; and to recommend to them to appoint by mutual consent arbiters to decide whether the capture was made within the jurisdiction of the United States, as stated in my letter of the 8th inst., according to whose award the Governor may proceed to deliver the vessel to the one or the other party." "If either party refuse to name arbiters, then the Attorney is to take depositions on notice, which he is to transmit for the information and decision of the President." "This prompt procedure is the more to be insisted on, as it will enable the President, by an immediate delivery of the vessel and cargo to the party having title, to prevent the injuries consequent on long delay."

In his letter of the 22d of November, 1793, the Secretary repeats, in substance, his letter of the 12th of July and 7th of August, and says that the determination to deliver up certain vessels, involved the brig Jane, of Dublin, the brig Lovely Lass, and the brig Prince William Henry. He concludes with saying: "I have it in charge to inquire of you, sir, whether these three brigs have been given up according to the determination of the President, and if they have not, to repeat the requisition that they may be given up to their former owners."

Ultimately it was settled that the fact should be investigated in the courts, but the decision was regulated by the principles established by the Executive Department.

The decision, then, on the case of vessels captured within the American jurisdiction, by privateers fitted out of the American ports, which the gentleman from New York has cited with such merited approbation; which he has declared to stand on the same principles with those which ought to have governed the case of Thomas Nash; and which deserves the more respect, because the Government of the United States was then so circumstanced as to assure us that no opinion was lightly taken up, and no resolution formed but on mature consideration; this decision, quoted as a precedent and pronounced to be right, is found, on fair and full examination, to be precisely and unequivocally the same with that which was made in the case under consideration. It is a full authority to show that, in the opinion always held by the American Government, a case like that of Thomas Nash is a case for Executive and not Judicial decision.

The clause in the Constitution which declares that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," has also been relied on as operating on the case, and transferring the decision on a demand for the delivery of an individual from the Executive to the Judicial department.

But certainly this clause in the Constitution of the United States cannot be thought obligatory on, and for the benefit of, the whole world. It is not designed to secure the rights of the people of Europe and Asia, or to direct and control proceedings against criminals throughout the universe. It can then be designed only to guide the proceedings of our own courts, and to prescribe the mode of punishing offences committed against the Government of the United States, and to which the jurisdiction of the nation may rightfully extend.

It has already been shown that the courts of the United States were incapable of trying the crime for which Thomas Nash was delivered up to justice. The question to be determined was, not how his crime should be tried and punished, but whether he should be delivered up to a foreign tribunal, which was alone capable of trying and punishing him. A provision for the trial of crimes in the courts of the United States is clearly not a provision for the performance of a national compact for the surrender to a foreign Government of an offender against that Government.

The clause of the Constitution declaring that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury, has never even been construed to extend to the trial of crimes committed in the land and naval forces of the United States. Had such a construction prevailed, it would most probably have prostrated the Constitution itself, with the liberties and the independence of the nation, before the first disciplined invader who should approach our shores. Necessity would have imperiously demanded the review and amendment of so unwise a provision. If, then, this clause does not extend to offences committed in the fleets and armies of the United States, how can it be construed to extend to offences committed in the fleets and armies of Britain or of France, or of the Ottoman or Russian Empires?

The same argument applies to the observations on the seventh article of the amendments to the Constitution. That article relates only to trials in the courts of the United States, and not to the performance of a contract for the delivery of a murderer not triable in those courts.*

In this part of the argument, the gentleman from New York has presented a dilemma, of a very wonderful structure indeed. He says that the offence of Thomas Nash was either a crime or not a crime. If it was a crime, the Constitutional mode of punishment ought to have been observed; if it was not a crime, he ought not to have been delivered up to a foreign Government, where his punishment was inevitable.

It had escaped the observation of that gentleman, that if the murder committed by Thomas Nash was a crime, yet it was not a crime provided for by the Constitution, or triable in the courts of the United States; and that if it was not a crime, yet it is the precise case in which his surrender was stipulated by treaty. Of this extraordinary dilemma, then, the gentleman from New York is, himself, perfectly at liberty to retain either horn. He has chosen to consider it as a crime, and says it has been made a crime by treaty, and is punished by sending the offender out of the country.

The gentleman is incorrect in every part of his statement. Murder on board a British frigate is not a crime created by treaty. It would have been a crime of precisely the same magnitude had the treaty never been formed. It is not punished by sending the offender out of the United States. The experience of this unfortunate criminal, who was hung and gibbeted, evinced to him that the punishment of his crime was of a much more serious nature than mere banishment from the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Virginia have both contended that this was a case proper for the decision of the courts, because points of law occurred, and points of law must have been decided in its determination.

The points of law which must have been decided, are stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be, first, a question whether the offence was committed within the British jurisdiction; and, secondly, whether the crime charged was comprehended within the treaty.

It is true, sir, these points of law must have occurred, and must have been decided; but it by no means follows that they could only have been decided in court. A variety of legal questions must present themselves in the performance of every part of Executive duty, but these questions are not therefore to be decided in court. Whether a patent for land shall issue or not is always a question of law, but not a question which must necessarily be carried into court. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to have permitted himself to have been misled by the misrepresentation of the Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

Constitution made in the resolutions of the gentleman from New York; and, in consequence of being so misled, his observations have the appearance of endeavoring to fit the Constitution to his arguments, instead of adapting his arguments to the Constitution.

When the gentleman has proved that these are questions of law, and that they must have been decided by the President, he has not advanced a single step towards proving that they were improper for Executive decision. The question whether vessels captured within three miles of the American coast, or by privateers fitted out in the American ports, were legally captured or not, and whether the American Government was bound to restore them, if in its power, were questions of law; but they were questions of political law, proper to be decided, and they were decided by the Executive, and not by the courts.

The casus fœderis of the guaranty was a question of law, but no man could have hazarded the opinion that such a question must be carried into court, and can only be there decided. So the casus fœderis, under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Great Britain, is a question of law, but of political law. The question to be decided is, whether the particular case proposed be one in which the nation has bound itself to act, and this is a question depending on principles never submitted to courts.

If a murder should be committed within the United States, and the murderer should seek an asylum in Britain, the question whether the casus fœderis of the twenty-seventh article had occurred, so that his delivery ought to be demanded, would be a question of law, but no man would say it was a question which ought to be decided in the courts.

When, therefore, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has established, that in delivering up Thomas Nash, points of law were decided by the President, he has established a position which in no degree whatever aids his argument.

The case was in its nature a national demand made upon the nation. The parties were the two nations. They cannot come into court to litigate their claims, nor can a court decide on them. Of consequence, the demand is not a case for judicial cognizance.

The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations. Of consequence, the demand of a foreign nation can only be made on him.

He possesses the whole Executive power. He holds and directs the force of the nation. Of consequence, any act to be performed by the force of the nation is to be performed through him.

He is charged to execute the laws. A treaty is declared to be a law. He must then execute a treaty, where he, and he alone, possesses the means of executing it.

The treaty, which is a law, enjoins the performance of a particular object. The person who is to perform this object is marked out by the Constitution, since the person is named who conducts the foreign intercourse, and is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The means by which it is to be performed, the force of the nation, are in the hands of this person. Ought not this person to perform the object, although the particular mode of using the means has not been prescribed? Congress, unquestionably, may prescribe the mode, and Congress may devolve on others the whole execution of the contract; but, till this be done, it seems the duty of the Executive department to execute the contract by any means it possesses.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends that, although this should be properly an Executive duty, yet it cannot be performed until Congress shall direct the mode of performance. He says that, although the jurisdiction of the courts is extended by the Constitution to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, yet if the courts had been created without any express assignment of jurisdiction, they could not have taken cognizance of cases expressly allotted to them by the Constitution. The Executive, he says, can, no more than courts, supply a legislative omission.

It is not admitted that, in the case stated, courts could not have taken jurisdiction. The contrary is believed to have been the correct opinion. And although the Executive cannot supply a total Legislative omission, yet it is not admitted or believed that there is such a total omission in this case.

The treaty, stipulating that a murderer shall be delivered up to justice, is as obligatory as an act of Congress making the same declaration. If, then, there was an act of Congress in the words of the treaty, declaring that a person who had committed murder within the jurisdiction of Britain, and sought an asylum within the territory of the United States, should be delivered up by the United States, on the demand of His Britannic Majesty, and such evidence of his criminality, as would have justified his commitment for trial, had the offence been here committed; could the President, who is bound to execute the laws, have justified the refusal to deliver up the criminal, by saying, that the Legislature had totally omitted to provide for the case?

The Executive is not only the Constitutional department, but seems to be the proper department to which the power in question may most wisely and most safely be confided.

The department which is entrusted with the whole foreign intercourse of the nation, with the negotiation of all its treaties, with the power of demanding a reciprocal performance of the article, which is accountable to the nation for the violation of its engagements with foreign nations, and for the consequences resulting from such violation, seems the proper department to be entrusted with the execution of a national contract like that under consideration.

If, at any time, policy may temper the strict execution of the contract, where may that political discretion be placed so safely as in the department whose duty it is to understand precisely the state of the political intercourse and connexion between the United States and foreign nations, to understand the manner in which the particular stipulation is explained and performed by foreign nations, and to understand completely the state of the Union?

H. OF R.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

MARCH, 1800.

This department, too, independent of judicial aid, which may, perhaps, in some instances, be called in, is furnished with a great law officer, whose duty it is to understand and to advise when the casus frederis occurs. And if the President should cause to be arrested under the treaty an individual who was so circumstanced as not to be properly the object of such an arrest, he may perhaps bring the question of the legality of his arrest before a judge, by a writ of habeas corpus.

It is then demonstrated, that, according to the principles of the American Government, the question whether the nation has or has not bound itself to deliver up any individual, charged with having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of Britain, is a question the power to decide which rests alone with the Executive department.

It remains to inquire whether, in exercising this power, and in performing the duty it enjoins, the President has committed an unauthorized and dangerous interference with judicial decisions.

That Thomas Nash was committed originally at the instance of the British Consul at Charleston, not for trial in the American courts, but for the purpose of being delivered up to justice in conformity with the treaty between the two nations, has been already so ably argued by the gentleman from Delaware, that nothing further can be added to that point. He would, therefore, Mr. MARSHALL said, consider the case as if Nash, instead of having been committed for trial. Admitting even this to have been the fact, the conclusions which have been drawn from it were by no means warranted.

Gentlemen had considered it as an offence against judicial authority, and a violation of judicial rights to withdraw from their sentence a criminal against whom a prosecution had been commenced. They had treated the subject as if it was the privilege of courts to condemn to death the guilty wretch arraigned at their bar, and that to intercept the judgment was to violate the privilege. Nothing can be more incorrect than this view of the case. It is not the privilege, it is the sad duty of courts to administer criminal judgment. It is a duty to be performed at the demand of the nation, and with which the nation has a right to dispense. If judgment of death is to be pronounced, it must be at the prosecution of the nation, and the nation may at will stop that prosecution. In this respect the President expresses constitutionally the will of the nation; and may rightfully, as was done in the case at Trenton, enter a nolle prosequi, or direct that the criminal be prosecuted no farther. This is no interference with judicial decisions, nor any invasion of the province of a court. It is the exercise of an indubitable and a Constitutional power. Had the President directed the Judge at Charleston to decide for or against his own jurisdiction, to condemn or acquit the prisoner, this would have been a dangerous interference with judicial decisions, and ought to have been resisted. But no such direction has been given, nor any such decision been required. If the President determined that Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British Government for a murder committed on board a British frigate, provided evidence of the fact was adduced, it was a question which duty obliged him to determine, and which he determined rightly. If, in consequence of this determination, he arrested the proceedings of a court on a national prosecution, he had a right to arrest and to stop them, and the exercise of this right was a necessary consequence of the determination of the principal question. In conforming to this decision, the court has left open the question of its jurisdiction. Should another prosecution of the same sort be commenced, which should not be suspended but continued by the Executive, the case of Thomas Nash would not bind as a precedent against the jurisdiction of the court. If it should even prove that, in the opinion of the Executive, a murder committed on board a foreign fleet was not within the jurisdiction of the court, it would prove nothing more; and though this opinion might rightfully induce the Executive to exercise its power over the prosecution, yet if the prosecution was continued, it would have no influence with the court in deciding on its jurisdiction.

Taking the fact, then, even to be as the gentlemen in support of the resolutions would state it, the fact cannot avail them.

It is to be remembered, too, that in the case stated to the President, the Judge himself appears to have considered it as proper for Executive decision, and to have wished that decision. The President and Judge seem to have entertained, on this subject, the same opinion, and in consequence of the opinion of the Judge, the application was made to the President.

It has then been demonstrated—

1st. That the case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the President, was completely within the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

2d. That this question was proper for Executive, and not for Judicial decision; and,

3d. That in deciding it, the President is not chargeable with an interference with Judicial decisions.

After trespassing so long, Mr. MARSHALL said, on the patience of the House, in arguing what had appeared to him to be the material points growing out of the resolutions, he regretted the necessity of detaining them still longer for the purpose of noticing an observation which appeared not to be considered by the gentleman who made it as belonging to the argument.

The subject introduced by this observation, however, was so calculated to interest the public feelings, that he must be excused for stating his opinion on it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that an impressed American seaman, who should commit homicide for the purpose of liberating himself from the vessel in which he was confined, ought not to be given up as a murderer. In this, Mr. M. said, he concurred entirely with that gentleman. He believed the opinion to be unquestionably correct, as were the reasons that gentleman had given in support of it. He had never heard any American avow a contrary sentiment, nor did he believe a contrary sentiment could find a place in the bosom of any American. He could not pretend, and did not pretend to know the opinion of the Executive on this subject, because he had never heard the opinions of that department; but he felt the most perfect conviction, founded on the general conduct of the Government, that it could never surrender an impressed American to the nation which, in making the impressment, had committed a national injury.

Case of Jonathan Robbins.

H. OF R.

This belief was in no degree shaken by the conduct of the Executive in this particular case.

In his own mind, it was a sufficient defence of the President from an imputation of this kind, that the fact of Thomas Nash being an impressed American was obviously not contemplated by him in the decision he made on the principles of the case. Consequently, if a new circumstance occurred, which would essentially change the case decided by the President, the Judge ought not to have acted under that decision, but the new circumstance ought to have been stated. Satisfactory as this defence might appear, he should not resort to it, because to some it might seem a subterfuge. He defended the conduct of the President on other and still stronger ground.

The President had decided that a murder committed on board a British frigate on the high seas, was within the jurisdiction of that nation, and consequently within the twenty-seventh article of its treaty with the United States. He therefore directed Thomas Nash to be delivered to the British Minister, if satisfactory evidence of the murder should be adduced. The sufficiency of the evidence was submitted entirely to the Judge.

If Thomas Nash had committed a murder, the decision was that he should be surrendered to the British Minister; but if he had not committed a murder, he was not to be surrendered.

Had Thomas Nash been an impressed American, the homicide on board the Hermione would, most certainly, not have been a murder.

The act of impressing an American is an act of lawless violence. The confinement on board a vessel is a continuation of the violence, and an additional outrage. Death committed within the United States, in resisting such violence, would not have been murder, and the person giving the wound could not have been treated as a murderer. Thomas Nash was only to have been delivered up to justice on such evidence as, had the fact been committed within the United States, would have been sufficient to have induced his commitment and trial for murder. Of consequence, the decision of the President was so expressed as to exclude the case of an impressed American liberating himself by homicide. He concluded with observing, that he had already too long availed himself of the indulgence of the House to venture farther on that indulgence by recapitulating or reinforcing the arguments which had already been urged.

When Mr. MARSHALL had concluded, Mr. DANA rose and spoke against the resolutions.

An adjournment was then called for and carried—yeas 50, nays 48.

SATURDAY, March 8.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report made on Thursday, last, by the Committee of the whole House to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the seventh ultimo, containing their disagreement to the motion referred to them on the twentieth ultimo; and the said motion being read, in the words following, to wit:

“Resolved, That it appears to this House that a person calling himself Jonathan Robbins, and claiming to be a citizen of the United States, impressed on board a British ship-of-war, was committed for trial in one of the Courts of the United States, for the alleged crime of piracy and murder committed on the high seas, on board the British frigate Hermione. That a requisition being, subsequent to such commitment, made by the British Minister to the Executive of the United States, for the delivery of the said person (under the name of Thomas Nash) as a fugitive under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Great Britain, the President of the United States did, by a letter written from the Department of State, to the Judge who committed the said person for trial, officially declare his opinion to the said Judge that he ‘considered an offence committed on board a public ship-of-war on the high seas, to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs;’ and, in consequence of such opinion and construction, did advise and request the said Judge to deliver up the person so claimed, to the agent of Great Britain who should appear to receive him—provided, only, that the stipulated evidence of his criminality should be produced. That, in compliance with such advice and request of the President of the United States, the said person, so committed for trial, was, by the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, without any presentment or trial by jury, or any investigation of his claim to be a citizen of the United States, delivered up to an officer of his Britannic Majesty, and afterwards tried by a court martial and executed, on a charge of mutiny and murder.

“Resolved, That, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States declares that the Judicial power shall extend to all questions arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and, also, that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where such crimes shall have been committed, but when not committed within any State, then at such place or places as Congress may by law have directed: And, inasmuch as it is directed by law ‘that the offence of murder, committed on the high seas, shall be deemed piracy and murder, and that the trial of all crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought.' Therefore, the several questions, whether the alleged crime of piracy and murder was committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain; whether it comes within the purview of the said twenty-seventh article; and whether a person, stating that he was an American citizen, and had committed the act of which he was accused in attempting to regain his liberty from illegal imprisonment, ought to be delivered up without any investigation of his claim to citizenship, or inquiry into the facts alleged in his defence, are all matters exclusively of judicial inquiry, as arising from treaties, laws, constitutional provisions, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction:

"That the decision of those questions by the President of the United States, against the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States, in a case where those courts had already assumed and exercised jurisdiction, and his advice and request to the Judge of the District Court that the person thus charged should be delivered up, provided only such evidence of his criminality should be produced as would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, are a dangerous interference of the Executive with Judicial decisions; and that the compliance with such advice and request, on the part of the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, is a sacrifice of the Constitutional independence of the Judicial power and exposes the administration thereof to suspicion and reproach."

Mr. NICHOLAS spoke in answer to Mr. MARSHALL.

The question was then taken that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 35, as follows:

A motion was made to adjourn. Mr. MACON hoped the House would sit and decide the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, so as to have done with the business, and not to enter on another week with it; however, 54 rising for the adjournment, it was carried.

MONDAY, March 10.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Campbell Smith, reported their agreement to the bill without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the thirteenth of January last, a petition of Cato West and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, complaining of the political system by which the said Territory is governed; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said report, and that the same be re-committed to Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. NOTT, and Mr. BARTLETT.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions, to wit:

Resolved, That, from and after the organization of the Mississippi Territory, the Governor shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, shall appoint, all officers, both civil and military, of the Territory, whose appointments are not particularly vested in Congress by the ordinance; provided, that the Governor shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Legislative Council, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Resolved, That every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Legislative Council, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory: if he approve, he shall sign it; but, if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections, at large, on their journals, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within six days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case, it shall not be a law.

Resolved, That every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the Governor of the Territory, and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him; or, being disapproved by him, shall be re-passed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Resolved, That the General Assembly shall meet at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the — day of —, unless they shall, by law, appoint a different day: Provided, that the Governor shall have power, on extraordinary occasions, to convene both Houses of the General Assembly, or either of them.

Post Roads.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That neither House, during the session of the General Assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the committee last mentioned.

CASE OF JONATHAN ROBBINS.

Mr. BAYARD moved that the Committee of the whole House, to whom was referred the Message of the President relative to Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins, and a resolution submitted by himself to the House, approbating the conduct of the President, and referred to that Committee, be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

A long debate arose upon this motion, in which Messrs. RANDOLPH, DAVIS, JONES, NICHOLAS, LIVINGSTON, and EGGLESTON, spoke against it—and Messrs. BAYARD, BIRD, OTIS, KITTERA, VARNUM, RUTLEDGE, EDMOND, SHEPARD, and H. LEE, in favor of it; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 35, as follows:

POST ROADS.

Mr. H. LEE moved the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire, and report by bill or otherwise, the expediency of making further provisions, by law, to facilitate the communication between different parts of the United States, by means of post roads.

Mr. HARPER also laid the following resolutions on the table.

Resolved, That for the more convenient, certain, and expeditious conveyance of the mails of the United States, on the main post road, leading from Portland in Maine, to Augusta in Georgia, it is expedient to make provision for promoting and aiding the establishment of turnpike, on the said road, and for rendering the course thereof more direct, between the places through which it is, or shall be, directed by law to pass; and that the surplus revenue of the Post Office ought to be set apart as a fund for those purposes.

Resolved, That the said fund ought to be vested in a board, under the direction of the President of the United States, and to be composed of the Secretaries of the Executive departments of the United States, and the Attorney General; and that when any company shall undertake to make a good turnpike road on any part of the said post road, and shall apply to the said board, stating their object, plan, and means, and shall offer good and sufficient security for the accomplishment of the undertaking, within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the said board, and for refunding any money to be advanced to them by the said board in case the said undertaking should not be so accomplished, the said board ought to be authorized and empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to grant an act of incorporation to the said company, for the purposes aforesaid, and under certain conditions, terms, and restrictions, to be established by law; and to subscribe from the said fund and on behalf of the United States, for any number of shares of the said company, not exceeding one-third of the whole number: Provided, That the payments to be made on account of the said subscription, shall be made in such portions, and at such times, as the said board shall stipulate, and may be withheld by the said board, at its discretion, whenever the said company shall fail to make its stipulated payments.

Resolved, That whenever two or more companies shall apply as aforesaid, the preference ought to be given to that which shall apply for the part of the said post road nearest to the city of Washington in either direction: Provided, that the plan of such company shall appear to the President of the United States, to be, in other respects, equally worthy of adoption with those of its competitors.

Resolved, That if there should not be in any one year, sufficient applications as aforesaid to employ the whole of said funds, the surplus thereof ought to be applied, in manner aforesaid, to any other post road of the United States, respecting which application in manner aforesaid, shall be made; or, at the discretion of the President of the United States, to be carried to the fund for the next year.

Resolved, that the tolls and dividends to be derived from the shares which shall be subscribed for as aforesaid, ought to be received at the Treasury of the United States, and there accounted for, and added annually to the aforesaid fund, to be applied in manner aforesaid, to the purposes thereof.

Resolved, That when the said main post road shall be completed, the fund aforesaid ought to be applied in manner aforesaid, to the construction of turnpike roads on any other post road in the United States, and of toll bridges on such main or other post road.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to alter and establish sundry post roads. After some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

H. OF R.

Marine Corps.

MARCH, 1800.

TUESDAY, March 11.

The House then went into Committee on the bill to alter and establish certain post roads; several amendments were made thereto, with which the House concurred; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Campbell Smith was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom were referred so much of the Speech of the President at the commencement of the present session as relates to the revision and amendment of the Judiciary system, reported a bill to provide for the better establishment and regulation of the Courts of the United States.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the several petitions of Thomas Frothingham, of Massachusetts; of sundry citizens and inhabitants of the counties of Washington and Allegany; of Andrew Finley and others, citizens of Westmoreland county; and the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the four Western counties of Pennsylvania; made a report, which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, March 12.

An engrossed bill to alter and establish certain post roads, was read and passed.

MARINE CORPS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on a bill for the government of the Marine Corps, while on shore.

[The reported bill contained a section providing that; if any marine officer or private should commit any offence against the person or property of any citizen, while on shore, that is punishable by the known laws of the land, the commanding officer or officers of every company or party, is required to use his utmost endeavors to deliver up such accused person to the civil magistrate, upon demand made by such magistrate, and shall also aid and assist the officers of justice in apprehending such offender, in order to bring him to trial—any officer refusing as aforesaid, on application being made to him by a civil officer to deliver or aid in the delivery of such person to the civil magistrate, every such officers so offending, and being thereof convicted in any court of law in the county where the fact was committed, by the oath of two credible witnesses, shall be cashiered and forever afterwards incapacitated to hold any military commission in the service of the United States.]

This, so far as related to a trial before a court of law, was moved and carried in Committee of the Whole to be struck out. When the question came up in the House to agree with the report of the Committee of the Whole to strike out the words in italic, a warm and long debate ensued; the question to agree was taken by yeas and nays, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 47, nays 44, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be re-committed to Mr. PARKER, Mr. OTIS, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. CRAIK, and Mr. CHAMPLIN.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit any forfeitures which shall occur, or may have occurred, under the laws of the United States prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, under the same provision which the Secretary is authorized to remit forfeitures incurred, under the revenue laws; and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom was yesterday re-committed their report on the petition of Cato West and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

The bill for removing troops from places of holding elections, was read a third time and passed; and the title declared to be "An act to prevent the interference of any military force in certain elections."

The bill entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the District Court in North Carolina," was read a third time and passed.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill allowing a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act regulating the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and disagreed to the same, only five members voting in favor of it.

[The Senate proposed to insert "from and after the tenth day of April next," thereby fixing the operation of the act from that period.]

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. HARPER said it had been represented to him, that there was considerable defect in the law requiring the payment of money from the collectors of the revenue into the Treasury; that the Secretary felt himself very much inconvenienced, and that there existed no sufficient compulsory means to enforce payment; he therefore moved the following resolution.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report by bill or otherwise, whether any and what further provisions are necessary to be made by law, for compelling the receivers of public money to account for and pay over the same.

This resolution was agreed to.

INDIAN INTERCOURSE.

Mr. JONES said the law for regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes, had been found to operate very oppressively on individuals in the State of Georgia, and expensively to the United States, as the trial of offenders under the act must be had before one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Georgia, who resided at the distance of one hundred and fifty miles from the frontiers, where offences under this act are committed; and must be conveyed for such trial under an escort of United States troops, however trivial and harmless the offence may be, and slight the punishment prescribed for it. Supposing, as he did, that the inferior courts were competent to execute the provisions of the act, Mr. J. moved the following resolution, with a view to that effect, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the law for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and for preserving peace on the frontiers; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee, appointed to consider and report on the expediency of amending the Judiciary system of the Northwestern Territory; and also on the expediency of dividing said Territory into two distinct and separate governments—when the resolution reported by the committee recommending a division of the Territory, was agreed to. The Committee then rose, and upon the question, will the House agree with the Committee in their agreement to the said resolution; a long debate ensued, and the House adjourned without taking the question upon it.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States:

"That, after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, the choice of Electors of President and Vice President shall be made by dividing each State into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors, to be chosen in such States, and by the persons in each of those districts who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State choosing one Elector in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe.

"That the election of Representatives to Congress, who are to serve after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, shall be by dividing each State into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which such State shall be entitled, and by the people within each of those districts who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such States choosing one Representative in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe."

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

PATENTS FOR USEFUL INVENTIONS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the privilege of obtaining patents for useful discoveries and inventions, to certain persons therein mentioned, and to enlarge and define the penalties for violating the rights of patentees; when

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which provides that an alien, after due residence, shall be entitled to patents for useful discoveries and inventions, &c.

MESSRS. HARPER, SMITH, RUTLEDGE, and OTIS, opposed this motion, and Messrs. KITTERA and GRISWOLD spoke in favor of it; and contended that foreigners might, under this section of the bill, obtain a complete monopoly of the whole American market. After some observations of Mr. OTIS, who wished an amendment might be introduced, which should provide that the patent to be granted to any alien should continue to his benefit during his residence in this country only, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

LAND WARRANT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee on the petition of John Mountjoy, and the resolution reported by the committee, authorizing the proper officers to issue a land warrant to said Mountjoy, in lieu of one said to be lost. Messrs. D. FOSTER and MACON opposed it, and wished to make a general question whether all warrants lost or destroyed ought to be renewed.

Mr. GRISWOLD was of the same opinion, and moved that the Committee rise, for the purpose of having this petition, and all others of a similar nature referred to a select committee, with instructions to report on the expediency of passing a general law on the subject.

The Committee having rose, and leave being refused to sit again, the proposition of Mr. G. was adopted, and the Committee instructed by a resolution of the House, to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War to issue to the officers and soldiers of the Continental Army, warrants for bounty lands, which may have been obtained from the War Office by fraud, or may have been lost or destroyed.

MONDAY, March 17.

A petition of Mary Wooster, relict of the late Major General Wooster, was presented to the House and read, stating that her said husband, on entering into the service of his country, during the late war with Great Britain, (in which he fell, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven,) relinquished his half-pay as a British officer; and praying that an indemnification may be granted her for the loss of the same, or that she may receive the same justice which has been done to others in similar circumstances.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

An engrossed bill to fix the compensation to the Paymaster General and the Assistant to the Adjutant General was read and passed.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill supplementary to an act entitled an act to provide for the final settlement of the limits of the State of Georgia, and for authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory; which was twice read and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. A. FOSTER proposed the following resolution:

"That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the bill passed the present session of Congress, entitled an act providing for the second census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States."

It was agreed to, and the committee appointed.

Mr. COOPER from the committee appointed on that subject, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President be authorized to employ an agent who shall be instructed to collect all the material information relative to a copper bed on the south side of Lake Superior; and to ascertain the Indian title to such land, in case it should be the wish of the United States Government to work a mine there; and also to inquire as to the terms upon which it may be obtained, and that a report be made thereof to Congress."

Referred to a Committee of the whole House.

A resolution proposed by Mr. JONES on Friday, relative to trade and intercourse with the Indians was taken up and agreed to, and five members appointed for that purpose.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;' and ask a conference thereon.

MEDAL TO CAPTAIN TRUXTUN.

Mr. PARKER observed that information had been received of a very gallant action having occurred between a frigate of the United States of 38 guns, commanded by Commodore Truxtun, and a French vessel of 52 guns, which was extremely bloody, but valiant on the part of the United States commander. It was not usual to grant emoluments on account of any particular gallant action to our officers, but to give approbation was common and consistent. In other countries, he said, monuments had been erected to commemorate such splendid victories.

As a testimonial of the regard of Congress for the officers who so bravely supported the flag of the United States, and to encourage similar acts of bravery, he would propose the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That a golden medal, emblematical of the late action between the United States frigate Constellation of 38 guns, and the French ship-of-war La Vengeance of 52 guns, be purchased under the Secretary of the Navy, and be presented to Captain Thomas Truxtun, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in the above engagement, wherein an example was exhibited by the captain, officers, sailors, and marines, honorable to the American name and instructive to its rising Navy.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

LOAN OF MONEY.

The House then resolved itself into Committee on the bill to enable the President to borrow money for the public service.

This bill caused much debate, but at length passed through the Committee without amendment, and the question for engrossing was superseded by a motion to adjourn, which was carried.

TUESDAY, March 18.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, of yesterday, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act for allowing a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the proposed conference; and that Mr. SEWALL, Mr. WALN, and Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred a resolution to inquire whether any, and what, further credit ought to be given on articles of produce imported into the United States from the West Indies, reported, that it would be inexpedient, at the present time, to extend the terms of credit given by law on said articles.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. OTIS, from the Committee of Defence, reported a bill for the regulation of public arsenals and magazines; which was read a first and second time, and committed for Thursday.

The bill to enable the President to borrow money for the public service was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the amendatory patent law, when Mr. GRISWOLD withdrew his motion to strike out the first section, upon Mr. HARPER's offering an amendment which obviated his objections, and the bill was agreed to as amended, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE CONSTELLATION.

Mr. PARKER moved that the unfinished business be postponed for the purpose of taking up the resolution which he yesterday laid on the table, relative to the captain, officers, and crew of the Constellation; when

Mr. NICHOLSON said he wished it might not be taken into consideration until some official information was received upon the subject from the Secretary of the Navy, upon which resolutions can be grounded. In his opinion the resolution of the gentleman did not go far enough. It had been said, that a young officer had voluntarily lost his life, rather than shrink from his duty, which he thought ought to be noticed. He was in favor of giving his approbation of the conduct of the officers and crew in more general terms than the resolution on the table contemplated.

After some observations from Messrs. CHAMPLIN and HARPER, who were of the same opinion,

Mr. PARKER said, he did not suppose a doubt could exist upon this subject sufficient to require any further information than had been received through the medium of the newspapers. He had seen a letter in the possession of the Secretary of the Navy, from Captain Baker, of the Delaware, who had every opportunity of knowing the situation of the enemy's frigate, was in the same harbor, and, being a nautical man, was of course able to give a correct opinion on her then situation, and the evident marks of the bravery of her antagonist with whom she contended—this was sufficient to satisfy his mind.

If, said Mr. P., gentlemen think the resolution does not go far enough, there is no one who will more cheerfully concur in offering other testimonies of approbation than myself. With respect to the young officer,* whose gallantry and good conduct had been so highly spoken of, it was his intention to have brought forward a resolution for setting up his bust in a niche of the Capitol of the city of Washington.

Mr. P. concluded with observing that he had no objection to call for information from the Secretary of the Navy, and would therefore withdraw his motion.

Mr. PARKER then moved that the House come to the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to lay before this House any information he may possess respecting the engagement which lately took place in the West Indies between the United States frigate Constellation and a French ship-of-war; and, also, respecting the conduct of James Jarvis, a midshipman on board the said frigate.

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the words in italic, which created considerable debate; when

Mr. BIRD proposed to insert in lieu thereof the following words: "And also upon the conduct of any officer or other person on board said frigate who may have particularly signalized himself in the said action;" which Mr. B. supposed would meet the intention of the mover, and be less liable to objection than the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. PARKER having consented to the modification, the resolution was agreed to.

LIMITS OF GEORGIA, &c.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act entitled an act for an amicable settlement of the limits of the State of Georgia, and for authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved two additional sections to the bill—one of which abrogates the power of the Governor of that Territory to prorogue the Legislature at his pleasure—upon which a very long debate ensued.

Both resolutions were finally agreed to, 52 members voting in favor of each of them. The Committee rose, and upon the question, Will the House concur in the report of the Committee in their agreement to said additional sections? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Theodorus Bailey, John Bird, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Matthew Clay, William C. C. Claiborne, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, John Dennis, George Dent, Joseph Dickson, Joseph Eggleston, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, Albert Gallatin, Samuel Goode, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, John A. Hanna, Thomas Hartley, Joseph Heister, William H. Nicholson, Abraham Nott, Josiah Parker, John Randolph, John Smilie, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, David Stone, Thomas Sumter, Benjamin Taliaferro, John Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

NAYS—George Baer, Bailey Bartlett, Jonathan Brace, John Brown, Christopher G. Champlin, William Craik, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, William Edmond, Thomas Evans, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Jonathan Freeman, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Elizur Goodrich, William Gordon, Roger Griswold, Robert Goodloe Harper, Archibald Henderson, James H. Imlay, Henry Lee, Silas Lee, Samuel Lyman, John Marshall, Harrison G. Otis, Thomas Pinckney, Jonas Platt, John Reed, Samuel Sewall, Wm. Shepard, George Thatcher, John Chew Thomas, Richard Thomas, Peleg Wadsworth, Robert Waln, and Lemuel Williams.

And the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

DIVISION OF NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the whole House, made the thirteenth instant, to whom was referred the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the judicial establishment of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and into the expediency of dividing the said Territory into two distinct and separate governments; and the resolution reported from the Committee of the whole House being again read in the words following, to wit :

* Son of Mr. James Jarvis, of New York, and midshipman on board the Constellation in the engagement of the 1st of February, who was killed by the falling of the mast.

Sundry Bills, &c.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio be divided into two distinct and separate Governments, by a line beginning at the mouth of the Great Miami river, and running thence a north course until it intersects the boundary line between the United States and Canada.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. CRAIK, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. BIRD, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, March 19.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of John Collet; which was read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. GRISWOLD observing that so much had lately been mentioned about our national debt and its increase, in the public papers, he would lay on the table the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine the accounts of the United States relating to the public debt, and to report how far the same has been increased or diminished since the establishment of the Government of the United States under the present Constitution."

A petition of Oliver Pollock, renewing his former application for compensation on account of moneys advanced for, and services rendered, the United States, during the late war, was presented to the House and read, stating that he is possessed of new proofs in support of his said demand, and praying that the House will go into an investigation of the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims.

A memorial of the Select and Common Councils of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress may take such precautionary measures to prevent the introduction of the plague, which has for some time prevailed in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, as to their wisdom shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

SUNDRY BILLS.

The following engrossed bills were read the third time, and passed:

An act providing for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and establishing a regular Government in the Mississippi Territory;

An act to extend the privilege of obtaining patents for useful discoveries and inventions to certain persons therein mentioned; and to increase and define the penalties for violating the rights of patentees; and

An act to enable the President of the United States to borrow money for the public service.

The yeas and nays being called on the passage of the last named bill, were taken, and stood—yeas 52, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, George Baer, Bailey Bartlett, John Bird, Jonathan Brace, John Brown, Christopher G. Champlin, William Cooper, William Craik, John

Davenport, John Dennis, George Dent, Joseph Dickson, William Edmond, Thomas Evans, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Jonathan Freeman, Henry Glen, Samuel Goode, Chauncey Goodrich, Elizur Goodrich, William Gordon, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Robert Goodloe Harper, Archibald Henderson, William H. Otis, Josiah Parker, Jonas Platt, Leven Powell, John Reed, Samuel Sewall, James Sheafe, Samuel Smith, Richard Dobbs Spaight, George Thatcher, Richard Thomas, Joseph B. Varnum, Peleg Wadsworth, Robt. Wain, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—Theodorus Bailey, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Matthew Clay, William C. C. Claiborne, John Condit, John Dawson, Joseph Eggleston, Lucas Elmdorf, John Fowler, Albert Gallatin, Andrew Gregg, John A. Hanna, Thomas Hartley, Joseph Heister, David Holmes, George Jackson, James Jones, Michael Leib, Matthew Lyon, Nathaniel Macon, Peter Muhlenberg, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Joseph H. Nicholson, John Randolph, John Smilie, John Smith, Richard Stanford, David Stone, Thomas Sumter, Benjamin Taliaferro, John Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, and Robert Williams.

MILITARY ACADEMY, &c.

Mr. OTIS, from the Committee of Defence, reported a bill for establishing a Military Academy, and for better organizing the corps of Engineers and Artillerists.

The bill was proceeding to be read, when Mr. OTIS suggested that as this bill contained much the same in detail as a report on the subject made by the Secretary of War, with which every gentleman was acquainted, he supposed the reading would not be necessary.

Mr. MACON said he should have no objection to its being read a first time, though he did not think it necessary; but he would give notice that it was his intention to move that the bill be rejected. He mentioned his reasons to be the expense of the measure generally, which it was an improper time to incur.

The bill having been read, he made the motion.

Mr. OTIS and Mr. CHAMPLIN answered. Mr. VARNUM supported the motion, which was at length negatived, 49 to 42; and the bill was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

RHODE ISLAND COLLEGE.

The House went into Committee on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition from the College of Rhode Island, praying payment for the occupation and certain injuries sustained by the said College on being used as an hospital for the troops of the United States, and of the French troops, during the war.

The report was, that compensation ought to be granted for the use and occupation, together with injuries sustained in the said College in its use by the Army of the United States, during the war, for an hospital.

Mr. CHAMPLIN proposed to amend the report by adding thereto, that compensation should also be made for its use by the French Army for the same purpose. Mr. C. as well as Mr. BROWN contended that it was proper that compensation should be allowed for its use and injury by the French, they being in the United States service, as part of the American Army. On the other hand, it was contended that the French Army were to procure their own supplies, and pay for their own damages, which, in many instances that were recited, they had done, and therefore that application should have been made to them.

H. OF R.

MARCH, 1800.

After considerable conversation, the motion was rejected.

The question, then, was for agreeing to the report. This caused considerable debate. On one side it was contended that this was a claim of a similar nature to many which had been rejected from individuals, and there could be no preference to this above the claim of an individual who had lost his property. Doubts were also expressed whether this claim was not barred by the statute. In support of the claim, instances were produced of Wilmington, Jersey, and Hartford Colleges, having received compensation in like cases; that the damages had been sustained, and the use made of the house, and that if any claim at all called for redress, it was incorporated literary societies, by which the Government was upheld. Mr. C. pressed the justice of the case with much zeal.

At length the resolution was agreed to in Committee, and the House concurred—yeas 51.

The Committee of Claims were instructed to report a bill accordingly.

THURSDAY, March 20.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Collet was read the third time and passed.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the Corporation of Rhode Island College.

Mr. CRAIK from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill to divide the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio into two separate governments.

Mr. JONES, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported a bill supplementary to the act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers.

These bills were severally twice read and referred to the Committee of the whole House.

The House went into Committee on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition from several aliens of Mount Pleasant, who prayed, that having neglected to make the declaration of their desire to become citizens before the period expired which was settled by law, they may not be subjected to wait fourteen years before they could become citizens.

The Committee, after stating a variety of reasons, reported that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted. The House concurred.

REMOVAL OF SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OTIS observed that it appeared to be the general opinion that the seat of Government would be removed to the Federal City, and that Congress would commence their next session at that place; and as some preliminary measures were necessary to be made previous thereto; and as it would be reposing too much power in the Commissioners who now act there to rely entirely on their reports; and as some measures must be reported and adopted before the end of the present session, he laid on the table the following resolution:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider what measures are expedient for Congress to adopt, preparatory to the removal of the seat of Government, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.”

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. GRISWOLD called up a resolution he yesterday laid on the table, which, after being modified by Mr. GALLATIN, was adopted, as follows:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine the accounts of the United States, so far as relates to the public debt; the amount of the expenses incurred; the amount of debt extinguished; and, generally, such facts as relate to the public receipts and expenditures under the present Constitution.”

Seven members were appointed.

Mr. HARPER moved that the said committee might be instructed to inquire into and ascertain, as near as may be, and report to the House, the amount of moneys paid since the establishment of the present Government for grants for incidental claims arising under the old Government; the amount of unfunded debt paid since that period; the amount paid for military pensions; the amount paid for the construction and repair of light-houses, beacons, &c.; the sum paid to quell the Western insurrection; the sum paid in fortifying the ports and harbors; the expenses of the fabrication of arms and military stores; the expenses of the ships-of-war, together with the amount of materials now on hand; the sums paid for the preservation of peace with the Indian tribes; the expenses for the relief and protection of American seamen; the amount for ascertaining and fixing the boundary lines of the United States; the sums paid for the preservation of peace with the Barbary Powers; and also a statement of the whole public property of every kind acquired, and now possessed, by the Government of the United States.

Mr. GALLATIN had no objection to the principle of the resolution, but, as the gentleman had gone into detail, if he by mistake had omitted any article, it would only lead the House into mistaken conclusions. He thought the amount of the whole of the expenditures as well as receipts ought to be stated in a general resolution, leaving the committee to give it in such detail as they might think proper.

Mr. HARPER said his object was not to obtain every expense of the whole Government; he did not want a statement of the civil list, but of what was called incidental and extraordinary expenses, into which the Government had been drawn by particular circumstances.

The motion was laid on the table.

STOUFFER AND WALLACE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the report of the Committee of Commerce on the petition of Stouffer and Wallace. The report recommended that the prayer of the petitioners should not be granted.

Mr. S. SMITH hoped the report would not be agreed to; he stated the committee to have been nearly equally divided in this case. It appeared that one of the petitioners (Mr. Wallace) being at Tortola, a British island, purchased the ship, for which a register was prayed, at $20,000; which ship had been captured and condemned, and sold in that island. Mr. S. contended that the ship was purchased under the orders and instructions of the Secretary of State, in a report made on this subject, (which was read,) and wherein it was considered proper to take vessels captured into the ports of Great Britain, or any other at war with France, provided the distance was great from the United States. Conceiving this ship entitled to all the privileges under this instruction, as it would have if it had been condemned and sold in the United States, he thought himself perfectly safe in purchasing the vessel, not doubting but she was entitled to a register.

Mr. SEWALL stated the reasons of the committee in reporting against the petition. It appeared that this gentleman had mistaken the law, and this mistake the committee thought ought to be borne by the petitioners, rather than admit a very injurious principle. The consequence would very probably be that vessels would be taken into a British port, in preference to an American port, and thus the United States would be parties in the war. Further, it appeared that this vessel was taken while the captors were in company with a British privateer. With respect to the instructions of the Secretary of State, it was not stated that all the advantages were to be allowed to a vessel sold in a British port, to which she would have been entitled if sold in the United States; and that the purchaser certainly ought to have inquired into the operation of the laws of the United States in the case, or abide by the consequences.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he had no doubt but the instructions of the Secretary of State were wrong, and contrary to the law, and that the determination of the committee was right, and he hoped it would be decided in that way.

Mr. SMITH again supported the right of the petitioner. It was but fair, he said, if a man had been led into an error, by the instructions of a public officer, that the Government should assist him. Mr. Wallace had nothing to do with the privateers; the captors brought the vessel and sold it to him, at the same time producing the order of the Secretary for his security.

The Committee agreed to the report of the select committee, and the House concurred—yeas 45, nays 31.

The House went into a Committee on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Amy Dardin, which was that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. Being taken up in the House, the propriety and impropriety of granting it was again contended, when there appeared in favor of the report 42, against it 42. The SPEAKER decided in the affirmative, so that the claim was not admitted.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for the execution of the twenty-seventh article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, made with Great Britain; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, March 21.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the committee appointed on the subject of the Western Reserve of Connecticut, made a report that the cession of the said lands ought to be accepted by the United States upon terms mentioned by a bill which he also reported, and which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PARKER, from the Naval Committee, reported a bill fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the Corps of Marines. Committed to the Whole House.

The House then went into a Committee on the bill supplementary to an act for regulating the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, &c.; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

Mr. OTIS called up his resolution, yesterday proposed, for a committee to inquire respecting the removal of the Government to the Federal City, which he now altered, so that the reference was made to the Committee of Ways and Means. The motion was agreed to.

ACTION OF THE FRIGATE CONSTELLATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with the instructions of the House, respecting the engagement which occurred between the frigate Constellation and a French ship-of-war. The report enclosed a letter from Captain Truxtun, detailing the action, and also extracts of letters from the American Consul at Curaçoa, and one from the American agent at St. Kitts, respecting the disabled state of the French ship La Vengeur. As to any particular specimen of valor, the Secretary received no information; but that all the officers and men had acted with the most unexampled bravery and decorum was attested by the Captain, whose good management was evinced by the singular success of the action. The Secretary mentions the singular bravery of James Jarvis, a Midshipman, who preferred death to quitting his post.

On motion of Mr. H. LEE, this report, together with a resolution proposed some days since by Mr. PARKER, was referred to the Naval Committee.

RHODE ISLAND COLLEGE.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the Corporation of Rhode Island College was read, and, on the question for its passage, Mr. RANDOLPH wished to know what difference there was in the principle of this claim and that which was yesterday negatived of Amy Dardin.

Mr. D. FOSTER stated it to be, that the claim of Amy Dardin was barred by the statute of limitation, whereas this was not; and, being just, a bill was reported on it. The principle of the bill was strongly contested by Messrs. GOODE, GALLATIN, and NICHOLAS, on the ground of its being barred by the statute. Messrs. D. FOSTER, OTIS, and CHAMPLIN, spoke in answer. At length Mr. S. SMITH moved the postponement of the question on the bill until Monday, in order to ascertain whether it was barred or not.

It was postponed.

CHILDREN OF MAJOR TRUEMAN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of J. Somerville and H. T. Compton, guardians of the orphan children of the late Major Alexander Trueman, who was killed in bearing a mission to the Indians. The report was, that the decision of the accounting officers of the Treasury was right, and that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted. Mr. E. FOSTER moved to agree with the report.

[It appeared that this claim was made for the difference of half-pay between a special law that was passed in this case, and a general law that was afterwards passed in behalf of the widows and orphan children of persons slain in battle, generally.]

Messrs. J. C. THOMAS, S. SMITH, and H. LEE, spoke in favor of the claim, and Messrs. D. FOSTER, MACON, and NICHOLAS, against it. After which the report was agreed to—ayes 48. The House concurred.

Mr. DAVIS afterwards laid on the table a resolution that a committee be appointed to report whether or not it was expedient to extend the general law of 1793 to the children aforesaid.

MONDAY, March 26.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making further provision for the removal and accommodation of the Government of the United States; which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

An engrossed bill, supplementary to the act for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, was read and passed.

Mr. HARPER, directed by the Committee of Ways and Means, proposed the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to prepare and report a bill or bills for making appropriations for the various branches of the public service during the present year."

Mr. HARPER reported a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, to amend an act providing for a second census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. Mr. H. stated this act to be only an alteration to conform the bill to an amendment made to the title of the bill which passed the present session. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MEDAL TO CAPTAIN TRUXTUN.

Mr. PARKER, from the Naval Committee, reported the following resolutions:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States be requested to present to Captain Thomas Truxtun, a golden medal, emblematical of the late action between the United States frigate Constellation, of 38 guns, and the French ship-of-war La Vengeance, of 54 guns, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in the above engagement, wherein an example was exhibited by the Captain, officers, sailors, and marines, honorable to the American name, and instructive to its rising navy.

"Resolved, That the conduct of James Jarvis, a Midshipman in said frigate, who gloriously preferred certain death to an abandonment of his post, is deserving of the highest praise; and that the loss of so promising an officer is a subject of national regret."

The House then proceeded to the consideration of these resolutions; the first of which being under consideration,

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that inasmuch as he could not give his assent to these resolutions, he felt impressed with the propriety of stating the reasons which would govern his vote.

It was not with any intention to detract from the deserved reputation which had been so nobly earned by the Captain, officers, and crew, of the Constellation; still less to withhold the well-earned applause due to that gallant youth who had sacrificed his life in the prosecution of his duty. It was to the first of these resolutions, only that he should deny his concurrence. He should do this, unless the gentlemen of the Naval Committee should show to him that it was the duty of the commander of the Constellation to persist in the chase, and compel to action a ship of such superior force. This conduct was, in his opinion, rash; and, when the situation of the United States and France was taken into consideration, it was peculiarly inadvisable. Our Commissioners were at this time in the capital of that country negotiating peace. How did the pursuit of this ship—the forcing her into an action, which ended in the crippling of both vessels—comport with that protection which was to be afforded to our commerce by the Constellation?

Mr. R. said that his duty obliged him to act upon his own opinion; and, however singular it may appear, he should vote against the first resolution, unless the gentleman who brought it forward would make it appear that it was the duty of Captain Truxtun to compel the Vengeance to come to action, when he knew her to be of such superior force. The second resolution met his most hearty approbation.

Mr. PARKER said, what the present state of things between the two countries might be, in the opinion of his colleague, he could not say; but Mr. P. conceived it was no other than it was at the time Congress passed a bill which prescribed the conduct of our naval commanders. In that bill they were authorized to take or destroy all French armed vessels; under these orders Captain Truxtun left this country, and, in obedience to instructions to that effect, he pursued and engaged this vessel, which, though of superior force, he had beaten. Had he not attacked her, it is most probable she would have proceeded against our commerce. The law having been passed by Congress, if the President of the United States had not given orders conformably thereto, he would have been subject to impeachment. He, therefore, presumed it to be his duty; and, most certainly, such orders being given to the commanders, they were bound to conform to them. Mr. P. thought that this and greater approbation ought to be expressed by Congress for conduct so brave and unprecedented. In some countries monuments had been raised, but this was unnecessary, though merited. Our naval exertions were very recent and confined, but an instance of extraordinary valor having occurred it ought to be honorably and suitably noticed.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, however he might agree with his colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) in a desire that no conduct should be encouraged that would tend to aggravate France in the present situation of things, he could not agree with him in his present sentiments. While we were in a state of actual, though not of declared war, Mr. N. thought it was naturally to be expected that our commanders would act in their complete military character, when our ships were arrayed for battle, and power given to act up to the full rigor which the laws of honor and of war would warrant. In the conduct of the Captain, as well as the crew, Mr. N. said, he saw nothing but what was extremely laudable, and highly meriting approbation.

Mr. LYON said he rose to request the division of the question on the resolutions. He was disposed to vote for the latter resolution, and not for the former.

The SPEAKER declared they would be divided, and that the question before the House was on the agreeing to the first resolution.

Mr. LYON observed that he had voted for the equipment of the three frigates under an impression that they would be employed solely for the protection of the commerce of this country; but now he found himself called upon to give thanks or praise to the commander of one of those frigates, and for what? for going out of the station assigned to him, as the most proper for the protection of the trading vessels of this country, in chase of a ship-of-war of much superior force; and for reducing the ship under his command, as well as that of his opponent, to a mere wreck. Mr. L. said he had seen nothing in the orders which had been published directing him to do this, nor did he think policy or prudence dictated the measure. Let all our naval commanders be excited to follow this example; let them play or fight each of them their vessel against a French vessel-of-war of superior force in the same way, and our naval force is crippled, while the French will scarcely feel their loss; then our commerce would be wholly at their merey. Besides these considerations, what is there to defend that commerce, on the station left destitute by the Constellation, while she is refitting. For his part he was as glad and proud as any gentleman that our officers, and our sailors, and our marines, had behaved gallantly and done themselves and their country honor, in the late action, but he did not feel himself bound, under existing circumstances, to give distinguished praise to the conduct which produced it; he should therefore vote against the resolution.

Mr. J. BROWN would vote for this resolution for the very reason which some gentlemen urged for voting against it. He thought the very fact of chasing a ship of superior force, and forcing her to an action which had been attended with success, was a commendable act. This to him would be the only inducement for paying so high a mark of national respect. If it had been an attack upon a vessel of inferior force, he should not think it worth notice. The objection was partly on account of the French ship being of superior force; surely this would rather be a reason why we should have vessels of greater force than we have now; therefore he hoped the worthy member would suffer that brave officer to go to sea next time with a 74-gun ship under his command, when he would doubtless bring the enemy to a good account.

The yeas and nays were called on this resolution and carried—yeas 87, nays 4, as follows:

The SPEAKER declaring himself in the affirmative the bill was passed.

The House went into Committee on the bill for the better regulation of the Courts of the United States, which was read through, when, the hour of adjournment being arrived, a motion was made for the Committee to rise, which was carried.

Progress was reported, and on the question "Shall the committee have leave to sit again?" leave was refused—yeas 38, nays 40, so the bill was lost.

TUESDAY, March 25.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution to that effect, reported, that it would be inexpedient to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit any forfeitures which have been or may be incurred under the laws of the United States prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, upon the same principles on which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to remit forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, incurred under the revenue laws. The House concurred in the report.

An engrossed bill to amend an act entitled, an act providing for the second census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, was read; and, after the title was amended so as to read "An act to alter the form of certain oaths and affirmations directed to be taken by the act entitled an act," &c., it was passed.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER observed that, yesterday, the bill to provide for the better establishment of the Courts of the United States was taken up in Committee, which rose at the usual hour of adjournment, reported progress, and was refused leave to sit again; it was however the opinion of the SPEAKER, that the bill was still to be considered in possession of the House; this inference he drew from the constant practice of the House; and therefore, though leave was refused to sit again, the House could now agree to recommit the bill either to the select committee, or to the Committee of the Whole. There never were but two questions on a bill, to commit or to engross; one of these modes he considered must indispensably be taken.

Mr. HARPER then, after some observations, moved to recommit the bill to a select committee.

Mr. GALLATIN contended that the bill was not at all in possession of the House, but in the Committee of the Whole; there the Speaker found it, and until they were discharged from the consideration of it, the Speaker had no power over it.

After some other observations, Mr. NICHOLAS moved its postponement till the first Monday in December next.

Mr. HARPER spoke against the motion, on the ground that gentlemen ought not to object to a system without either showing its impropriety or permitting its friends to show its usefulness. He wished the subject to undergo a discussion, when he was assured it would appear that many valuable improvements were introduced by this bill.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the question of postponement, and stood—yeas 44, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Phaniel Bishop, Rob't Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Matthew Clay, William Charles Cole Claiborne, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, George Dent, Joseph Eggleston, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, Albert Gallatin, Samuel Goode, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, John A. Mr. NICHOLAS then moved that the bill be taken up in Committee of the Whole.

The House resolved itself into a Committee thereupon.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the first section.

MARCH, 1800.

Courts of the United States.

H. OF R.

Mr. HARPER objected, and mentioned the nature and properties of the section.

Mr. NICHOLAS afterwards withdrew his motion, observing that he should reserve it for the seventh section, in which more of the principle of the bill was contained.

A lengthy debate then ensued on a motion of Mr. GALLATIN to strike out the sixth section, which related to suits being entered against the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned without taking the question.

WEDNESDAY, March 26.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the support of Government for the year 1800; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of a number of the inhabitants of the Illinois country, in the Northwestern Territory, stating that they inhabit a country of eight hundred miles in length and four hundred in breadth; that many of them have to go six hundred miles to a Judicial court; that immigrations are very numerous; on which, and numerous other accounts, they prayed a division of the Territory. This petition was referred to a Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred a bill on that subject.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee on the Judiciary bill.

The fifth section being under consideration, which made a provision for bringing claims against the United States to be tried before the Courts of the United States,

Mr. GALLATIN said he had yesterday moved to strike out this section, the impropriety of which he again contended; but, even if it were proper, the section by no means contained provisions to prevent frauds being practised in the claims that might be made. On which account, if the principle must pass, it ought to be the subject of a separate bill, wherein necessary precautions might be taken.

Mr. HARPER agreed as to the principle, but had no objection to striking out the section if another bill could be brought in to effect the object. He appealed to the Chair to know whether it would be in order, the section being struck out, (the rules of the House not admitting one bill to be twice brought into the House in one session,) to bring in a bill afterwards containing the same principle, but with additional provisions.

Mr. RUTLEDGE (the Chairman) gave his opinion that striking out the section would not preclude a bill being brought in to modify the same principle, when that was the main object.

The SPEAKER gave his opinion that it would be quite in order, since it was entirely distinct from the general provisions of the bill before the Committee, and would be complete without this; which, if necessary, could be made the subject of another bill; certain, however, he was, that it ought to be much more guarded than the section made it. There were, he was well persuaded, many enemies to the fifth and sixth sections, who would wish the bill itself to pass; to such it would be a relief to strike out the sections, and could not possibly do injury.

The fifth and sixth sections were ordered to be stricken out.

The seventh section contained provisions for dividing the United States into twenty-nine districts, in each of which a circuit court should be established (which are enumerated.) Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out this section, and entered at large into his reasons, and in favor of the present Judiciary system in this respect. Mr. HARPER answered, giving the reasons why it was proper to change the present Judiciary system. Mr. S. SMITH spoke in favor of the motion; after which Mr. GALLATIN and Mr. HARPER again spoke. The Committee rose without a decision, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 27.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the memorial of Charles Pettit, referred to him by order of the House, on the eighth of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. NICHOLSON laid on the table a resolution that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives should be authorized to adjourn their respective Houses on the last day of April next.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House went into Committee on the Judiciary bill; the motion to strike out the 7th section, containing the principle of the bill, being under consideration,

Mr. MARSHALL entered into a lengthy defence of the new system, and spoke against the motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON replied in answer.

Mr. HARPER, in opposition to the motion, detailed the difference of expense between the present and the new system; it having been stated by the enemies of this bill that the expense of it would be $100,000 more than the present; Mr. H.'s statement made it only $46,500 more, which he contended was trifling compared with the essential advantages of a more perfect administration of justice.

Mr. DENNIS also spoke in favor of the bill, with certain modifications in the detail, and Mr. MASON and Mr. NICHOLAS against it.

The question was then taken upon striking out the first section, and carried—ayes 50.

The Committee then rose, obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY March 28.

Mr. D. FOSTER made a report, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred a resolution on the 13th of January last, that it was the opinion of the committee that no alteration ought to be made in the law passed the 12th of June, 1798, respecting the loan office and final settlement certificates, indents of interest, and unfunded or registered debt on the books of the Treasury.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVINGSTON observed, that great quantities of white cotton goods were imported into the United States, here printed, and again exported, which were not now entitled to a drawback of the duties; he, therefore, proposed the following resolution, which was carried:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a drawback on exported cotton goods of foreign manufacture, from the United States, and to report by bill or otherwise."

The House went into Committee on the bill fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the Corps of Marines; which was agreed to, and, when in the House, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. H. LEE proposed to the House the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That all the papers and packets sent to Mrs. Martha Washington, relict of the late General George Washington, shall be received and conveyed by post free from postage for and during her life."

A committee of three members was appointed to bring in a bill conformably thereto. A bill was accordingly reported by Mr. H. LEE, which was read, and ordered to be engrossed.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a report of the proceedings had under an act passed at the last session, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States;'" together with an account of the expense incurred within each State by publishing the laws therein.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the first Monday of May next.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the Judiciary bill.

Mr. HARPER observed, that the section yesterday stricken out in Committee of the Whole, contained the essential principle of the bill, by which almost all the subsequent sections were guided. It was, therefore, impossible for the Committee to proceed with the other sections, so immediately flowing from the seventh section, which had been stricken out. Believing a modification to be essentially necessary, and desirous of putting it into such a train as to be brought before the House, agreeably to the more general opinion as expressed in the debate, he moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged, for the purpose of afterwards moving the reference of the bill to a select committee.

Mr. OTIS also spoke in favor of the motion.

MESSRS. GALLATIN, S. SMITH, and NICHOLAS, spoke against the Committee being discharged; wishing that some grounds might be established before it should be referred, in order that the select committee might know upon what principles to report a bill. It was necessary first to know whether it was the will of the House to increase the number of districts; whether the Judges of the Supreme Court should go the circuits, or be confined to the mere business of appeal; and whether, if they are to go the circuits, the number of Judges ought to be increased. Knowing the will of the House on these important articles, the Committee would know what to do.

The motion was carried—ayes 57.

Mr. HARPER then moved that the bill be recommitted to a select committee.

Mr. MACON moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the first Monday in December next. He considered the vote of yesterday was a transcript of the will of the House. The session was far advanced, and every gentleman knew how improper it was to discuss any important subject at the end of the session.

Some debate took place on the motion. It was contended in favor of the bill that the revision of the system was very important; that the business being of a public nature, it was the duty of the House to stay to do it, whatever might be their desire to go to their homes. The House had time, and were bound to take it up; but, if it was left till next session, it might not be done. Besides, it was argued that the close of the present Executive's authority was at hand, and, from his experience, he was more capable to choose suitable persons to fill the offices than another.

The question was taken and stood—yeas 46, nays 52, as follows:

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

The House then went into Committee on the bill to divide the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the first section; he had heard no considerable reason why the present mode of government was improper, as related to the Governor.

Mr. HARRISON answered, that the Government was too unwieldy; that numbers of families had removed to the Spanish territory; that the number of inhabitants in the Western division was at least 15,000, and that it was the general wish of the people a division should take place.

Mr. HARPER also spoke in favor of the bill. He considered that a territory of 1,000 miles in length and about 700 in breadth, divided by an extensive wilderness, inhabited by Indians, was very much too large, and the local situation too dissimilar to admit of being one Government, either to enact equal laws or to provide for the execution of them.

The motion to strike out was negatived.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to amend so as that the Government of the two Territories should be the same as that of the Mississippi Territory lately passed into a law.

Mr. HARRISON wishing this motion had been suspended, and promising to introduce that principle in another bill if this should pass, Mr. C. withdrew it.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading on Monday next.

MONDAY, March 31.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying the House that they had passed "An act prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice President," to which they desired the concurrence of the House.

The bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The following engrossed bills were read, and passed:

An act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officers of the corps of Marines;

An act to extend the privilege of franking letters and packages to Martha Washington; and

An act to divide the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio into two separate Governments.

Mr. A. FOSTER, from the committee for that purpose, reported a bill supplementary to the law now in force, fixing the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 28th instant, the bill for the better establishment and regulation of the Courts of the United States, reported an amendatory bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, made the twenty-first instant, to whom was referred the petition of Gilbert Dench; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of the said Gilbert Dench cannot be granted, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to discharge Robert Sturgeon from his imprisonment," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

LAKE SUPERIOR COPPER MINES.

The House, according to the order of the day, again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the committee appointed, on the 5th instant, to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to appoint an agent to purchase of the Indians a tract of land on the south side of Lake Superior, which shall include the great copper bed; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ an agent, who shall be instructed to collect all material information relative to the copper mines on the south side of Lake Superior, and to ascertain whether the Indian title to such lands as might be required for the use of the United States, in case they should deem it expedient to work the said mines, be yet subsisting; and, if so, the terms on which the same can be extinguished: And that the said agent be instructed to make report to the President, in such time as the information he may collect may be laid before Congress at their next session.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

SALE OF NORTHWESTERN LANDS.

The House then resolved itself into Committee on the bill to amend the act entitled "An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river."

Mr. COOPER moved that the Committee rise, in order that the bill may be recommitted for the purpose of regulating the quantities to be exposed for sale.

H. OF R.

Sale of Northwestern Lands.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. GRISWOLD then moved to strike out the first section, in which he was supported by Mr. EDMOND, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. H. LEE, upon the ground of expense of surveying the lands, which must be very considerable, while the sale would be uncertain; that it would encourage encroachments upon the United States' land, from which it would be impossible to dispossess persons who would make this encroachment.

Messrs. GALLATIN, HARRISON, NICHOLAS, HARPER, and GORDON, spoke in favor of this bill, because it prevented speculators receiving the advantages resulting from offering the lands in large quantities for sale; that the former bill provided the sales to be either in quarter townships, or in lots of 640 acres; but the present bill offered the whole in lots of 320 acres, which must encourage actual settlers to purchase, and of course increase the price of the purchase; that the expense would therefore be soon refunded to the Treasury, with a considerable advantage to the United States, whereas by the operation of the former bill, the sales had been small.

The Committee of the Whole rose without a decision, and obtained leave to sit again.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 1.

Mr. S. SMITH brought in a bill to incorporate a company by the name and style of the Mine and Metal Company; which was read a first and second time, and committed for Friday next.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, reported sundry resolutions, recommending the further continuance of the following acts, which will expire with the present session, viz:

An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;

An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives, and to compel the attendance of witnesses;

An act to authorize the defence of merchant vessels of the United States, against French depredations.

In this report the House concurred.

Mr. GALLATIN also reported, that it would be advisable further to suspend the operations of the following acts, viz:

An act laying an additional duty upon salt imported into the United States, and for other purposes; and

An act further to suspend the duties on the manufacture of snuff within the United States, and of drawbacks on the exportation thereof.

The consideration of the question on the act laying a duty on salt, was postponed till to-morrow, and committed to a Committee of the whole House. The second resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying his report made in pursuance of a resolution of this House, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, directing him to lay before this House a report of the proceedings had under an act passed at the last session, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States,' together with an account of the expense incurred within each State, by publishing the laws therein; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to discharge Robert Sturgeon from his imprisonment:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The bill reported yesterday, to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States, was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

SALE OF NORTHWESTERN LANDS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river; when Mr. GRISWOLD's motion to strike out the first section being under consideration, Messrs. HARRISON, and J. BROWN spoke against it and Mr. COOPER in favor of it. The motion was at length negatived.

Mr. HARPER then moved an amendment, providing that no money should be paid for surveying the lands, until sufficient had been received into the Treasury from the sales authorized by the act; which was opposed by Messrs. GRISWOLD and JACKSON, as derogatory to the dignity of the Government, and was negatived.

Mr. J. BROWN then moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "half sections" and inserting "quarter sections," so as to have the land surveyed into lots of 160 instead of 320 acres; which was negatived.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, after having stated to the Committee the policy and necessity of granting some indulgence to the intruders on the public lands, moved the following amendment, viz:

"Provided, however, That every head of a family who shall have made an actual settlement or improvement on any part of the lands aforesaid, and shall reside on the same, shall have the right of pre-emption to the half section on which he resides, at the rate of — dollars per acre."

After some observations from Messrs. GALLATIN, JACKSON, and KITTEK, against the motion, it was negatived, there being only 17 yeas.

After making some amendments, the Committee rose, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, April 2.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to amend the act entitled, 'An act providing for the sale of lands, &c.," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce reported a bill to provide for repairs and additions to the light-house at New London; for the support of the light-house at Clark's Point, and for the erection and support of a light-house at Wigwam Point; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of Thomas Canfield was twice read, and referred to the committee respecting entering caveats on land.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Benjamin Wells, referred to him the first ultimo; and, also, a counter petition, signed by sundry inhabitants of Fayette county, in the State of Pennsylvania, referred to him on the twenty-fourth ultimo; which were read; and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEWALL, from the managers appointed, on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments proposed by the Senate, and disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill; and doth agree to the same, with an amendment.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-fourth of December, and on the first and thirteenth of January last, the several petitions of Thomas Burling and others, of John Collier and others, and of Cato West and others, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ithamar Canfield," was read twice and committed to the committee appointed, on the twelfth of February last, to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of passing a law to prevent entering a caveat, in any case, to hinder the issuing a patent for land granted for military services.

Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War, made the twenty-sixth of February last, on the petition of Samuel Lewis, senior, be referred to Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. SILAS LEE.

HEIRS OF HARDING AND TRUEMAN.

Mr. DAVIS called up a resolution which he laid on the table some days since, that a committee be appointed to consider whether the provision of the law of 29th April, 1798, may be extended to the widows and orphans of the late Colonel Harding and Major Trueman.

Messrs. D. FOSTER and MACON spoke against the reference; Messrs. PARKER, R. THOMAS, HARRISON, and DAVIS, in favor of it.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved its reference to the Committee of Claims, (instead of a select committee); which was supported by Messrs. NICHOLAS, and KITCHELL, and opposed by Messrs. RUTLEDGE, CLAIBORNE, S. SMITH, and BIRD. Thirty rising only in favor of this reference, it was negatived.

The resolution was then referred to a select committee—yeas 57.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the bill to make further progress for the removal and accommodation of the Government of the United States.

A motion was then made to fill a blank for the accommodation of the household of the President, about which considerable conversation occurred; when Mr. RUTLEDGE moved that the Committee rise, in order that time may be given for learning the amount of money wanting for this object, and because he supposed the chairman of the committee, who was absent, might be able to give that information. The motion was afterwards withdrawn, but renewed by the SPEAKER, and at length carried.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House then went into Committee on the bill for carrying into effect the twenty-seventh article of the Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. NICHOLAS was surprised a business so delicate as this should be entrusted solely to the Secretary of State; he conceived none less than the Executive ought to take steps for delivering over an offender under the treaty.

Mr. MARSHALL informed him that he was preparing an amendment to the 2d section of the act; which he afterwards produced, providing that on any requisition being made under this article, the testimony should be taken in writing and transmitted to the Secretary of State, and by him laid before the President of the United States, whose opinion should decide whether the matter was cognizable in any court of the United States, or whether the offender should be delivered up; if the former, that he should give directions to the Judge in whose district the offender was apprehended to proceed to trial according to law: if not, and the crime came under the treaty, that he should direct the Secretary of State to direct the Judge to make the delivery.

This was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS said this did not altogether remove his objection: he wished the Secretary of State to be out of the question, since it was not here as in Great Britain where the Secretary of State was the first Executive. However, he varied a motion he made to strike out these words, so as to read "the Secretary of State, under the direction of the President." This was carried.

Mr. NICHOLAS then proposed two provisos at the end of the section, the first of which went to prevent the delivery up of any person for offences, for the trial of which any Courts of the United States are competent, so as to preserve inviolable the Constitutional right of trial by jury. The other proviso went to permit any person so charged, if he was an American and impressed into the British service, to make claim thereof to the judge by whom he was committed, in which custody he should only remain for safe-keeping during the time in which he might be able to send for testimony to prove the facts of his claim, which depositions might be received by the judge in writing; against which the claimants should be allowed to bring proof that the person entered voluntarily into the British service, and that if it should appear he was impressed and kept on board a British ship, contrary to his desire, he should be discharged.

The Committee rose, in order to have these motions printed, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 3.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriation for the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1800; which was twice read and committed to the whole House.

Mr. HARPER observed that in some of the States lands were received in satisfaction of judgments, which also was the case in such places where the United States were plaintiffs. To remedy what he conceived an evil, he laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether any, and what, further provisions are necessary to be made relative to the sales of real estate delivered to the United States in satisfaction of judgments against persons indebted thereto."

Three members were appointed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NAVY.

The House then went into Committee on the bill for the better government of the Navy, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose.

The discussion of the bill occupied the House till near four o'clock, and a variety of amendments were made to it. After the Committee had risen, and the amendments were agreed to,

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the recommitment of the bill. He said he did this from impressions that some of the provisions of it were unconstitutional, men being to be tried, and suffer by the decision of a court martial, when the Constitution says, article 3, section 2: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." And the amendments to the Constitution, article 7, says: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger;" this, he conceived, prevented Congress ordering any court martial.

Mr. R. said he had no kind of objection to the bill, but he wished his scruples on these articles to be cleared up to him, or he must vote against it on the ground of unconstitutionality.

Mr. PARKER said, he considered it indispensable that persons in the Navy, as had been always the case in the Army, should be tried for offences by court martial. He believed the objections were fully answered by that part of the Constitution, article 1, section 8: "Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." The "rules and regulations," he supposed to be everything that related to subordination, which he thought was borne out by the exception in the amendment mentioned by the gentleman.

The motion to recommit was lost by a large majority.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 4.

An engrossed bill for the better government of the Navy was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to make appropriation for the Navy of the United States during the year 1800; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to lease certain salt springs, the property of the United States, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio; which was referred to the Committee of the whole House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the interference of any military force in certain elections."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to establish a General Stamp Office," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the said bill and amendments be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SUNDRY BILLS.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, reported the following bills:

A bill to continue in force an act, entitled an act laying duties on mills and implements used in the manufacture of snuff;

A bill to continue in force an act, entitled an act to authorize the defence of merchant vessels of the United States against French depredations;

A bill to continue in force an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

The two first were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday. The last was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the removal and accommodation of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HARPER proposed to amend the act so as that the sum to accommodate the household of the President of the United States with furniture, in addition to what was now in possession of the President, should not operate until after the third of March next. This he did, he said, in consequence of some Constitutional doubts which he had expressed. The Constitution declaring that the salary of the President should receive no addition nor diminution during his being in office. This was concurred in.

The question then was, what sum should be allowed for that purpose; $20,000, $15,000, and $10,000, were severally named.

Mr. RANDOLPH, considering the principle itself unconstitutional, moved, in order to defeat the section altogether (it having been amended and being out of order to move its being stricken out) to insert the sum of $500. These different sums called forth a lengthy debate. The sum of $20,000 was negative—45 to 39. That of $15,000 was carried—yeas 44, nays 42.

Mr. HARPER proposed a provision that this money should be expended under the direction of the Secretaries of the four Executive departments, which was agreed to; one thousand dollars was allowed for removing the public property appertaining to the household of the President to the Federal city.

Mr. D. FOSTER moved to strike out the 5th section, which provides that $10,000 shall be appropriated to pave such parts of the city as, in the opinion of the commissioners, and the Secretaries of Executive departments, may be convenient for the Government. This was negative, only 21 rising for it.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD the Secretaries of the Executive departments were inserted in lieu of the Secretary of Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, who were to provide for the accommodation of Congress.

Mr. SMITH moved a new section, which was carried—that the clerks of the several offices of the Departments of State, Treasury, War, Navy and General Post Office, should be allowed each one quarter additional salary to provide for their removal.

Nine thousand dollars were appropriated to furnish the two Chambers of Congress, offices, committee rooms, &c.

The Committee rose; when Mr. GALLATIN moved to strike out the 2d section, which provided $15,000, to accommodate the President's House with furniture. He did it, not because it would not be necessary to appropriate something, but he said what that something might be, would be better ascertained by waiting for the proper estimates, and until Congress moved there, when as much as should appear necessary might be appropriated, since it was not to come into use until after 3d of March.

Twenty-six members only rose in favor of this motion, so it was negative.

The bill being gone through, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

MONDAY, April 7.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred, on the fourth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to establish a General Stamp Office," made a report, which was received, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. H., from the committee to whom was referred, on the seventh ultimo, the memorial of Matthew Patterson and others, made a report; which was received, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following bills were read a third time and passed, viz:

An act to repeal the act laying duties on mills and implements employed in the manufacture of snuff;

An act to continue in force the act entitled, an act to authorize the defence of the merchant vessels of the United States against French depredation; and

An act to make further provision for the removal and accommodation of the Government of the United States—yeas 47, nays 32.

CONNECTICUT WESTERN RESERVE.

Mr. MARSHALL called for the order of the day, on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept, for the United States, a cession of jurisdiction of territory lying west of Pennsylvania, commonly called the Western Reserve of Connecticut.

Mr. COOPER moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till the first Monday in December next.

MESSRS. MARSHALL, HARRISON, HARPER, GRISWOLD, GALLATIN, KITTERA, C. GOODRICH, and DANA, opposed this motion, and Messrs. COOPER, BIRD, RANDOLPH, PLATT, and MACON, spoke in favor of it.

The question was at length taken by yeas and nays, and stood yeas 30, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Theodoros Bailey, John Bird, Samuel J. THE FISHERIES.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that the Senate have passed the bill to continue in force an act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, for the government of the fishermen employed therein, and for other purposes as therein mentioned, with an amendment.

The amendment, was taken into consideration, when,

Mr. CLAY moved a postponement of the question till the first Monday in December next, and called the yeas and nays upon it, which were after some debate taken, and stood: yeas 36, nays 54, as follows:

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

TUESDAY, April 8.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to authorize the sale and conveyance of lands in certain cases, by the Marshals of the United States, and to confirm former sales; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

The report made, yesterday, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred, on the fourth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to establish a General Stamp Office," was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the first, and doth disagree to all the other amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill.

Resolved, That a conference be requested with Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to; and that Mr. HARPER, Mr. GRIS-WOLD, and Mr. GALLATIN, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed for the purpose on the part of the Senate.

The report made, yesterday, from the committee to whom was referred, on the seventh ultimo, the memorial of Matthew Patterson and others, was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ILLINOIS COUNTRY.

Mr. HARRISON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of the ancient inhabitants of the Illinois country, made a report, recommending the agreement of the House to a bill therewith submitted, in addition to the act entitled an act for granting lands to the inhabitants and settlers of Vincennes, in the Illinois country, in the Northwestern Territory, and for confirming them in their possessions; which was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

VALUATION OF LANDS, &c.

Mr. HARPER said, he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means, to move that the House do come to the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to prepare and report a bill or bills, for authorizing the Commissioners under the act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, within the United States, in those States whereof the valuations have not yet been completed and returned, to revise, vary, and adjust the valuation of unseated lands, in the several assessment districts and sub-divisions, within their respective States; so as that the relative valuations of different tracts of such lands, in the same sub-division, be not varied or affected. And also for enabling the Surveyors of the Revenue, under the said act, to add to the lists of valuations within their districts, respectively, all such lands or dwelling-houses therein, as shall from time to time appear to have been omitted, by the assessors or otherwise, in receiving, making, or returning such lists. And also for authorizing the said Surveyors to erase from the said lists, all lands and dwelling-houses wherefrom the persons interested in the said lists respectively shall have been ejected in the due course of law, or upon the title whereto there shall have been a decision in due course of law against such person.

The resolution was agreed to, and Mr. HARPER accordingly brought in a bill to provide for equalizing the valuation of unseated lands; which was read a first and second time, and committed for to-morrow.

CONNECTICUT WESTERN RESERVE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept, for the United States, a cession of jurisdiction of territory lying west of Pennsylvania, commonly called the Western Reserve of Connecticut.

Mr. COOPER moved to amend the bill by striking out that part which goes to conciliate and adjust the right of Pennsylvania to some of the land in question; and thereby to defeat the bill.

APRIL, 1800.

Connecticut Western Reserve.

H. OF R.

Messrs. MARSHALL and GALLATIN opposed this motion, which was negatived—yeas 25.

Mr. ELMENDORF then moved to strike out that part of the first section which provides for the acceptance of the cession of a jurisdiction of soil by the United States from the State of Connecticut, and to amend the bill so as to accept the cession of jurisdiction only.

After some debate, Mr. GALLATIN called for a division of the question.

Mr. MARSHALL then entered into a lengthy discussion in favor of the bill, and against striking out.

The Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 9.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution respecting the orphan children of Colonel Hardy and Major Trueman, after stating the circumstances of their death, reported "a bill making further provisions for the children of the late Colonel John Hardy, and Major Alexander Trueman, deceased."

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the eighth of January last, the petition of William Nicholas, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to alter and to establish sundry post roads," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

WILLIAM TAZEWELL.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Tazewell, Esq., secretary to Elbridge Gerry, Esq., late Envoy to France, who prayed compensation for sundry extra services and expenses, together with losses on account of his capture in returning home, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in settling the accounts of William Tazewell, secretary to Elbridge Gerry, one of the late Envoys to the French Republic, the Secretary of State be authorized to allow the expenses incurred by him in consequence of his being captured on his return to his country.

The report was twice read and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

CONNECTICUT WESTERN RESERVE,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee on the bill to enable the Government to accept a cession of jurisdiction from Connecticut.

Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. NICHOLAS spoke at length against the principle of the bill. Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. S. SMITH spoke in favor of it.

Mr. GALLATIN moved a proviso which specially went to prevent the bill being construed to draw into question the conclusive settlement of the dispute between the States of Pennsylvania and Connecticut, by the decree of the Federal Court at Trenton, or to impair the right of Pennsylvania.

This was agreed to. Several other amendments were made, and, when the Committee rose, were concurred in by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 10.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill to extend the privilege of obtaining patents for useful discoveries and inventions to certain persons therein mentioned, and to enlarge and define the penalties for violating the rights of patentees, with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House. And then he withdrew.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments; and the same being read,
